SEC. 5197. Any association may take, receive, reserve, and charge on any loan or discount made, or upon any note, bill of exchange, or other evidences of debt, interest at the rate allowed by the laws of the State, Territory, or District where the bank is located, and no more, except that where by the laws of any State a different rate is limited for banks of issue organized under State laws the rate so limited shall be allowed for associations organized or existing in any such State under this title. When no rate is fixed by the laws of the State, or Territory, or district, the bank may take, receive, reserve, or charge a rate not exceeding 7 per cent., and such interest may be taken in advance, reckoning the days for which the note, bill, or other evidence of debt has to run. And the purchase, discount, or sale of a bona-fide bill of exchange, payable at another place than the place of such purchase, discount, or sale, at not more than the current rate of exchange for sight-drafts in addition to the interest, shall not be considered as taking or receiving a greater rate of interest.

SEC. 5239. If the directors of any national banking association shall knowingly violate, or knowingly permit any of the officers, agents, or servants of the association to violate any of the provisions of this title, all the rights, privileges, and franchises of the association shall be thereby forfeited. Such violation shall, however, be determined and adjudged by a proper circuit, district, or Territorial court of the United States, in a suit brought for that purpose by the Comptroller of the Currency, in his own name, before the association shall be declared dissolved. And in cases of such violation, every director who participated in or assented to the same shall be held liable in his personal and individual capacity for all damages which the association, its shareholders, or any other person, shall have sustained in consequence of such violation.

All these oaths have to be filed with the Comptroller, and they have been filed with him from 1876 up to 1881, each one of them interpolating that they will agree to violate the law as regards interest.

Before the national-bank charters are extended for twenty years, I want a provision impeaching, if necessary, or dismissing from office any Comptroller of the Currency who shall accept a false or a modified oath from any set of bank directors. That has been done here, and the Comptroller tells us he did not know it, when for five years it has been done, and he is the custodian of the oaths. If he did not know it he is not fit for the place he occupies. If he did know it he ought to be dismissed.

It is like the overcertification of checks which I brought up. The Comptroller reported to us in 1879 that banks were overcertifying checks to the amount of $100,000,000, and then the next year he apologized. By law the banks forfeited their charters by such an act, but the Comptroller did not have it done. I want the bill to go to the Committee on Finance, and to have these papers and records examined before it goes into a committee of conference, so as to see what punishment shall be inflicted upon the Comptroller for what I think is a known violation of his duty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky move to refer the bill?

Mr. BECK. I move to refer the bill and amendments to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALLISON. All that the Senator from Kentucky has said may be true——

Mr. BECK. It is true.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know but that some legislation is necessary in reference to the matters to which the Senator alludes, but evidently such matters cannot now, at this late stage of the bill, be put on the bill. After the House has concurred in a portion of the amendments sent to it and non-concurred in others, I do not see how it is possible, under the rules of the two Houses, to materially amend the amendments which we have already made. I suggest that we go on with this bill and send it to a committee of conference, and I hope the Senator from Kentucky will be a member of that conference, I will say to the Presiding Officer, in order that he may present his views intelligently, as he always does, to the committee of conference. I think that is the most satisfactory way.

Mr. BECK. I have examined the action of the House. They have concurred in some of the amendments of the Senate and non-concurred in others, and seek to modify others. There are plenty of places where the concurrence of the House can be had with the Senate amendments with amendments, in my opinion.

I not only will not be, but ought not to be, a member of the committee of conference, because I voted against the bill. Of course I do not desire to be a member of it, and ought not to be a member of it; but having looked over the Senate amendments that the House concurred in and those they did not concur in, I find that there are many important amendments made in the Senate, and it is perfectly proper for the Senate to confer with the House in regard to those amendments, of which the matter of which I spoke would be one, and it would be perfectly germane to some of the amendments. At any rate I desire the Committee on Finance to examine and look into the matter. What I have asked all the time is to require the national banks to obey the law and not to defy it. I make the motion to refer the bill and amendments to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the bill will not be referred to the Committee on Finance, for that committee will have all that it can do without this bill. So far as the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky is concerned, he will see himself that it would be impossible for a committee of conference on the part of the Senate to propose amendments to the amendment to which he referred, unless the House should offer some amendment to it. We cannot agree to it with an amendment.

I therefore hope that the bill will not be referred to the committee, but that a committee of conference will be appointed at once. It is evident that the Senator from Kentucky is not for the bill, either with or without amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the bill and amendments to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALLISON. Does that motion take precedence of a motion to ask for a conference?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that a motion to commit takes precedence.

Mr. ALLISON. I supposed that the rule provided that a motion which would bring the two Houses nearest together would be the motion first in order. Here is a disagreement between the two Houses, and the motion first in order ought to be a motion to bring them together.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Rule 43 provides that—

When a question is pending—

And the question is pending here that the Senate insist upon its amendments and ask for a conference—no motion shall be received but—

To adjourn,
To adjourn to a day certain, or that, when the Senate adjourn, it shall be to a day certain,
To take a recess,
To proceed to the consideration of executive business,
To lay on the table,
To postpone indefinitely,
To postpone to a day certain,
To commit,
To amend;

which several motions shall have precedence in the order in which they stand arranged.

The motion of the Senator from Kentucky is to commit the bill to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I should like to ask what it is that the Senator from Kentucky moves to commit?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill.

Mr. MILLER, of California. He has not offered an amendment to be proposed to it.

Mr. MORRILL. He cannot offer an amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. The bill comes back here I suppose with the non-concurrence of the House to certain of the Senate amendments, and the motion of the Senator from Kentucky is certainly in order, to commit it, if the Senate sees proper so to refer it, in order that the committee may consider those amendments and see whether they will modify them or what disposition they will make in regard to them.

Mr. MORRILL. Let me say to the Senator from Tennessee that the only action which can possibly take place on the part of the committee or of the Senate would be to recede from the Senate amendments, and that would not be agreeable to the Senator from Kentucky or perhaps to any one else.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg to suggest to the Senator from Vermont that he is mistaken. It would be perfectly competent for the committee to recommend modifications of the amendments disagreed to by the House. They are open for the action of this body through its committee.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to make an inquiry. If the bill is recommitted, that is equivalent to a vote to reconsider the action by which the bill was passed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Every Senator must answer for himself upon that point. The Chair cannot tell the Senator. The Senator from Iowa moved that the Senate insist upon its amendments which have been disagreed to by the House. Pending that question the Senator from Kentucky has moved to commit the bill, which motion is first in order.

Mr. MORGAN. There must be some parliamentary consequence which follows the motion to commit, if it prevails in the Senate; and what is it? It is either to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, or it is to commit the bill with the amendments and the disagreement of the House to the Senate committee for a recommendation as to such action as the Senate shall take thereupon. It must have one effect or the other.

I do not think that it is legitimate to refer the bill back to the committee at this time, unless the Senate shall agree to reconsider the vote by which it passed the bill, for that committee is shut out by the action of the Senate of record here from the consideration of any other matter than the mere question of the agreement or disagreement to the action proposed by the House.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not remember that I ever knew of such a motion as this to be made. On the contrary, the parliamentary rule——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would inform the Senator from Ohio that a similar motion was made the other day by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] on a bill sent to his committee. The reference was made so that the committee might consider whether the Senate should recede from its action or insist upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. But that is quite different. This bill has passed both Houses of Congress. The Senate made certain amendments to the bill. The House have agreed to some of them and disagreed to others. The only question between the two Houses that by possibility can now be presented to either House is the pending disagreeing amendments. Here is the rule, one of the oldest joint rules of Congress:

In every case of an amendment of a bill agreed to in one House and dissented to in the other, if either House shall request a conference, and appoint a committee for that purpose, and the other House shall also appoint a committee to confer, such committee shall, at a convenient hour, to be agreed on by their chairmen, meet in the conference chamber and state to each other, verbally or in writing, as either shall choose, the reasons of their respective Houses for and against the amendment, and confer freely thereon.

I do not deny that under the general parliamentary law, the Senate having agreed to a bill, and having proposed amendments to that bill, it may in case of disagreement defeat the bill or lay it on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The House has not asked for a conference. It has concurred in some of the amendments and non-concurred in others.

Mr. SHERMAN. It has not asked for a conference because by custom it is usually allowed to us to make the request. It may be that we will recede from the amendments, and with the exception of one amendment disagreed to I am in favor of receding from them; but it seems to me we are departing from the parliamentary rule which always tends to promote an agreement between the two Houses. The bill has passed beyond our consideration; the text of the bill cannot be changed even by the unanimous consent of the Senate; it would be a violation of the rules of the Senate and of the rules of parliamentary order. We cannot play Indian in this game; we cannot pass a bill and then recede from it afterward. We may recede from the amendments that we proposed to the House which are in our power, or we may go and confer with them, and if the amendments are not agreeable to the Senate we may change them somewhat or abandon them, or we may get the House conferees to agree with us; but there is nothing pending between the two Houses except the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments.

It is a violation of the rules to bring any new matter into this debate. I remember when a distinguished Senator of this body, the present Postmaster-General, Mr. Howe, undertook, by consent of a committee of conference, to introduce new matter, the Senate practically reproved him, so much so that Mr. Howe refused to consent to serve on any future committee in regard to that subject matter, because it was deemed to be a violation of his duty to vary in the slightest degree from the question between the two Houses, which was the question of the pending amendments disagreed to by one of the Houses.

It would be an extraordinary proceeding for us to send back this bill to the Committee on Finance with a view to introduce matter not contained in the pending amendments. It would be an extraordinary proceeding, and I trust the Senate will not do it. No doubt if there is any matter that the Senator from Kentucky thinks important he may introduce it as a separate bill and refer it to the Committee on Finance; but now this bill has gone beyond that stage of legislation in which anything can be considered except the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me to ask him a question? Why would it be improper for the Senate to ask the advice of the Committee on Finance as to whether we should concur in the action of the House on the pending amendments? There is no assumption in such a reference that some new matter is to be inserted, but it is simply a proposition to send the bill to the committee by which the bill was originally considered, and to take, upon the question of concurrence or non-concurrence, the judgment of that committee, as we took the judgment of the committee upon the bill as it came from the House originally.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Kentucky himself states, with the usual frankness which always distinguishes him, that he desires certain extraneous matter not embraced in the amendments, but which is new matter, inserted in the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. That is not a part of the motion. The motion is simply to refer the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I merely desire to say that the Committee on Finance should be the last body to proceed to open up these questions after they have gone beyond a certain stage. It never would do; you never would get the two Houses to concur, if at every stage either House could introduce new matter, or if the bill should be referred back to the committee from which it had been reported. I do not say that the Senate may not do that. The Senate may kill this bill by laying it on the table; it may refer it to the Committee on Finance or any other committee; it may do with it what it pleases; because until it is passed finally it is not a law of the land. But we have agreed to the bill with certain amendments, and those amendments we submit to the House and simply ask their concurrence. They say they have concurred with the great body of the amendments, but upon some of them they want further information, and as the chairman of the committee there properly said, (and I have a right to quote what he said in a public debate,) they wished to enlarge some of the amendments of the Senate, and they proposed to do that after a conference with the Senate.

It is now proposed to refer the bill back to one of our organs, after the Senate has passed upon the bill, with a view to get up another controversy with the House. I say if it is within our power it is unwise and ought not to be done. All questions of conference between the two Houses form the most delicate process of legislation. We cannot add one single thing to the proposition we have made to the House. We have passed the bill with certain conditions; and they could, in spite of our efforts, call up the bill and agree to our amendments and pass the bill while we had it referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BECK. I suppose all know, as it is every-day practice, that when the House disagree to certain amendments of the Senate to their bill and agree to others, it is entirely competent for the Senate, where the House has asked for no committee of conference, to remit the bill back to the committee from which it came to see whether we shall concur with the House in their disagreement to our amendments or whether we shall insist upon our amendments, as we have a right to do.

The Committee on Finance having charge of the bill, and desiring now to inaugurate a new system to last for twenty years, if that committee found that something the House had disagreed to could be agreed to with an amendment, and that this matter which I suggested was a proper amendment to insert, it has the absolute power to propose it. At any rate that was the committee which considered the bill in the first instance. Certain amendments reported by that committee to the Senate, which were agreed to by the Senate, have been non-concurred in by the House.

The question is, shall we agree with the House in its non-concurrence absolutely, or shall we refuse to do it? Shall we trust it to two or three men, or trust it to the Committee on Finance and then to the Senate? When the House asks for a committee of conference, we may agree to it, after we have instructed our committee of conference how far we will agree with the House, how far we will modify, if we do not entirely take back the amendments we had put in the bill, in in order to see if the House will not agree to the amendments as modified, and then send them to the House and agree to a conference if they desire it. It is neither unusual nor improper.

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator hold that the difference between the two Houses could now be removed by the Finance Committee? Take for illustration the two sections that they have disagreed to, as I understand, the section relating to gold certificates and the section relating to certified checks. Those are two matters in dispute.

Mr. BECK. There are a great many other matters.

Mr. ALLISON. I know; but those are the two principal matters. Can the Committee on Finance in any way aid in solving those difficulties? The House must either agree to those amendments and themselves suggest amendments, or we must recede from them. That seems to me to be the only parliamentary course open to us.

Mr. BECK. We can recede from any amendment we have made with an amendment, and submit that to the House.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not see how that can be done. We can concur with an amendment, but I do not see how we can recede with an amendment.

Mr. BECK. We can concur with an amendment, which means to strike this all out and put in a different clause, as has been done a hundred times, and the Senator from Iowa has helped to do it; but before action by a conference I want the benefit of the opinion of the Committee on Finance in regard to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the committal of the bill to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to amend by adding to the motion to commit the following:

With directions that the committee advise the Senate whether or not they should adhere to the amendments to which the House has disagreed.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator that he should say "insist" and not "adhere."

Mr. MORGAN. That is the proper language, "whether or not they should insist upon the amendments to which the House has disagreed."

I am not willing that there shall be a general committal of this bill to the Committee on Finance. I think it is a violation of parliamentary law to do it. It undertakes to open up a question that we cannot open in that way. The time for the reconsideration of this bill has passed under our rules, and no man could reach it except by unanimous consent, and perhaps not in that way, to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed in the Senate. It has been in the possession of the House and has been there amended by the agreement of the House to certain of our amendments, so that it does not come back to us as a new bill, but as a bill improved by amendments that the House has agreed to and that the Senate has concurred in. Therefore the only question at issue between the two Houses is the question of disagreement, and not the question whether the bill should pass. The bill has passed, and we cannot get behind that.

I think that if any committee of this body is to take the subject in charge now it should be specially limited, so that we may know precisely what that committee is to do. We have a right to take their views, perhaps, as to whether the Senate ought to recede from its amendments so far as the House has non-concurred in them; but that is as far as that or any committee is allowed to go.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator from Alabama if it is not better to allow the matter to go to a committee of conference?

Mr. MORGAN. I shall vote against the motion to commit, even when amended. I wish to say that since I have had the honor of a place in the Senate I have frequently seen what I will characterize as an abuse, to which the Senator from Kentucky has referred to-day, and which he says he and the Senator from Iowa have frequently participated in. I mean by that, legislation in the conference committees, and legislation after bills have passed both bodies. I do not agree that we have any right to do that. It is not constitutional legislation. The matter has not been brought before the Houses and read three times on three several days, or on the same day by unanimous consent. Legislation of that kind that creeps in through the action of a conference committee is dangerous in the last degree, and I have always disapproved of it.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator from Alabama is entirely right. If this bill should go to the Committee on Finance and come back and receive the instructions of the Senate, we could not have a committee of free conference.

Let me say another thing. The abuse on the part of one or two banks in Richmond in relation to the oath will not be likely to be reproduced again. I have no doubt that the Comptroller of the Currency would rather go to prison for two or three years or pay a fine than to receive another scolding from the Senator from Kentucky. This being a solitary instance, in which the Senator from Kentucky has taken a deep interest, and one that is not likely to be again repeated, I hope that the usual course in relation to a bill of this kind will be allowed to be taken, and that the bill will go to a committee of conference, and if the committee on the part of the House see fit to propose any amendments to the amendments that are still pending and not ratified by the House, of course a committee of conference can agree to them or not, as it may see fit.

Mr. BECK. The chairman of the Committee on Finance seems to take great pride in asserting that I am a common scold, because of the objections I have made to the action of the Comptroller of the Currency, and he and his friends take a common good care that that Comptroller's action is not investigated as it ought to be. All I can do, being in a minority on the committee and on the floor of the Senate, is to call attention to violations of the law, and to the failure of the Comptroller of the Currency to do his duty. I do not know but that there are one hundred banks, it may be a thousand or two thousand, where the same oaths are permitted by him to be taken that are in the two that my attention happened to be called to. When I was told of them I laid the matter before the committee without bringing it before the Senate, and sent to the Secretary of the Treasury and to the Comptroller for information. I have a letter before me now, in which they fail to give any information that there were any such oaths filed in the Comptroller's office. It was only when I knew the fact to be true, by corresponding again with gentlemen in Richmond, after the Comptroller had refused a member of Congress from Virginia permission to see them, after he had refused the district attorney for the district the right to see them, that I had a resolution passed through the Senate demanding that the information should be sent here, and it had to come. When it did come, it showed that the directors of the Merchant's National Bank and of the National Bank of Virginia in the city of Richmond had filed oaths in plain violation of law, excepting from the oaths and from the provision of the title of the Revised Statutes, the right to charge usury, and they have been doing it, and doing it, as they say, without being guilty of perjury, because they excepted it from the oath that was held by the Comptroller.

I called attention the other day to the fact that eleven of the great banks in New York were certifying checks when no money was deposited there, and when the laws were positively against it, and a forfeiture of their charters was the penalty. I read the report of the Comptroller himself in 1879 when he was piqued at the banks, in which he said that practice had grown to be an enormous evil up to a hundred million dollars. The question was asked, "Have you sought to punish any bank for a violation of the law." No, he had sent examiners there, and he said in the next report if they did not quit it he would punish them, but he never has done so. When this bill was before us an amendment was sent by him which had to be taken back because they did not do what he wanted, or he did not want the Senate to understand what he did want to do.

I only ask that the Comptroller of the Currency shall, as a faithful public officer of the people of the United States, punish those banks for violations of law; that he shall not allow false oaths to be filed in his office, and that he shall not allow banks to certify checks when there is no money, without punishing them as required by law. When I ask that, it is not scolding at him. I demand as a representative of one of the States of this Union that the officer who does allow false oaths to be filed, who does allow false certification of checks, who does anything in violation of his known duty, shall be dismissed from office or shall be punished, and I do not mean to scold him. You may protect him. The Senator from Vermont is perhaps able to protect him against all I may say, but here in my place when any officer of this Government, whether he is a Comptroller of the Currency or any other, violates his known duty, I expect always to expose the fact and call upon the representatives of the people to see that he does not violate the law, as he is their public servant.

Mr. MORGAN. I am entirely in sympathy with the Senator from Kentucky in his desire to bring this subject to public attention; and I am not trying to protect this officer against exposure or against any penalty that might properly be visited upon him. But the Senator from Kentucky ought to bring in his bill to rectify this evil, if a bill is necessary. I deny the constitutional power of the Senate at this moment of time to put that subject on this bill. That is the proposition I advance. I would very gladly go into it if the bill was now before the Senate and the subject was in reach of us; but I do not believe it is.

of the Senator from Alabama to the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, proposing instructions to the Committee on Finance.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky to commit the bill and amendments, with the instructions moved by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. COKE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. What is the use of referring this bill to the Committee on Finance with these instructions? The amendments that are disagreed to by the House are amendments that were put on the bill in the Senate, and they are important amendments. One of them is the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, and another is the amendment of the Committee on Finance in reference to gold certificates. Why take the sense of the Committee on Finance as to whether we should insist on these amendments or recede from them? Certainly the Senate will not recede from these amendments until they have had an opportunity of further consultation with the House.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Will the Senator from Iowa tell me what he thinks the best course?

Mr. ALLISON. I think the best course is to insist on our amendments now and ask for a committee of conference and confer with the House in regard to them, and let them know at once that we insist on the amendments.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. In other words, the Senator thinks we had better have a committee of conference.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BECK. That means to have three men in the Senate and three in the House confer without any advice from the Committee on Finance or any chance for the House to judge.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Has not the Senate already passed on what the Senator from Kentucky proposes? I take it that the committee of the Senate will adhere to what the Senate has done.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GORMAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ALDRICH.]

Mr. McDILL, (when Mr. MITCHELL's name was called.) The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL] is paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 16, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—16.

Beck,	Coke,	Harris,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	George,	Jackson,	Voorhees,

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] that the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. ALLISON, Mr. MORRILL, and Mr. BECK were appointed.

JAPANESE INDEMNITY FUND.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1052) in relation to the Japanese indemnity fund.

Mr. MORGAN. I scarcely know whether it is my duty to move in this matter or that of the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill as amended is really the bill of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and ask for a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to; and by unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has to go outside in some respects of the Committee on Foreign Relations. In Jefferson's Manual, on page 271 of our compilation, it is said:

Those who take exceptions to some particulars in the bill are to be of the committee, but none who speak directly against the body of the bill; for he that would totally destroy will not amend it. (Hakew., 146; Town., col. 208; D'Ewes, 634, col. 2; Scob., 47;) or, as is said, (5 Grey, 145,) the child is not to be put to a nurse that cares not for it. (6 Grey, 373.) It is therefore a constant rule "that no man is to be employed in any matter who has declared himself against it." And when any member who is against the bill hears himself named of its committee, he ought to ask to be excused. Thus, March 7, 1606, Mr. Hadley was, on the question being put, excused from being of a committee, declaring himself to be against the matter itself. (Scob., 46.)

This bill was really taken charge of by the Senator from Vermont, who seems to have dominated it, and the Chair appoints as the committee of conference Mr. MORRILL; Mr. FERRY, of the Committee on Foreign Relations, who voted with the Senator from Vermont; and Mr. MORGAN. Those three are the conference committee.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 5538) to reduce internal-revenue taxation was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6244) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

The Acting Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. In the appropriations for the Bureau of Education the Committee on Appropriations proposed, in line 2304, after the word "dollars," to insert:

Collector and compiler of statistics, $2,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2313, after the word "dollars," to insert:

One engineer and skilled laborer, at $1,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2317, to increase the total amount of the appropriation for compensation of the Commissioner of Education and the clerks and employés in his office from $42,180 to $45,780.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the office of the Commissioner of Railroads, in line 2344, after the word "three," to strike out "one clerk of class 2;" and in line 2346, after the word "all," to strike out "sixteen thousand and" and insert "fourteen thousand six hundred and;" so as to make the clause read:

Office of Commissioner of Railroads: For commissioner, $4 500; bookkeeper, $2,400; assistant bookkeeper, $2,000; railroad engineer, $2,500; one clerk of class 3; one copyist, $900; one assistant messenger; in all, $14,620.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 2351, to insert:

For books and book-cases, $1,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2364, after the word "grounds," to insert "who, in addition to their present duties, shall have and exercise the authority of policemen;" so as to make the clause read:

Under the Architect of the Capitol: For person in charge of heating apparatus of the Congressional Library and Supreme Court, $864; for one laborer in charge of water-closet in central portion of the Capitol, $660; and for three laborers for cleaning Rotunda, corridors, and Dome, at $660 each; for the pay of six watchmen employed on the Capitol grounds, who, in addition to their present duties, shall have and exercise the authority of policemen, at $720 each; in all, $7,824.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriation for the "office of the Director of the Geological Survey," in line 2377, to reduce the item for compensation of the "Director" from "$6,000" to "$5,000."

Mr. CALL. I object to the amendment of the committee, and hope it will not be concurred in. This is the only purely scientific department in this Government. The director is one of the most eminently scientific men to be found in any country. He is one of the most laborious. His work is creditable to the American people, and is highly useful in the advancement of science and in its benefit to the people of this country. In mining, in agriculture, in the classification of the land, in the advancement of intelligence of the highest order, there is no department of this Government to compare to it.

Look at the salary allowed to similar officers. The Superintendent of the Coast Survey, for instance, has $6,000; the salary of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is $6,000. This amendment proposes to reduce the salary of this eminently worthy, capable, and useful scientific man to the same amount as that given to the assistant fish commissioner, $5,000. If this were a sufficient remuneration for a man of eminent capacity, if it was what his talents could obtain in other employment, it would not justify the reduction proposed in this bill, because, contrary to the position that has been taken in the Senate time and again, for which there is not the slightest shadow of reason, the Government does not owe a man simply what it can get his services for; it owes him a generous and a liberal compensation; it owes him upon any principle of sound morality and fair dealing a sufficient support for himself and his family in the station or position in which his duties require him to be placed.

There is just as much reason for giving this officer $5,000 or $8,000 as there is for giving the judges of the Supreme Court and the President of the United States the salary awarded them. If he were in any foreign government his services would command not $6,000 but $20,000, for he has no superior, as all men who have any acquaintance with scientific matters will readily admit when they come in contact with him and examine the work of his department, that he has no superior in the paths of scientific research which he has followed. The work performed in the Geological Bureau of the Government has no superior anywhere in the world in its accuracy, in its comprehensiveness, and its usefulness to the practical and scientific purposes of the day.

I say, then, that in my judgment there is no kind of warrant for the reduction of the salary proposed by the committee, and I hope it will not be concurred in.

What is the effect of this constant cry for reducing the salaries of those who serve the people in public places. It does not lessen the amount of the taxes in any material respect. It does not make the poor man richer, increase his wages, or enhance the value of the products of the farmer. These will be secured only by having the people well served, by enabling poor men of capacity to turn from the more profitable pursuits of business and private life to the service of the people in public places without consigning themselves and their families to poverty and want, and to inferior social position to those who follow the pursuits of private life.

What Senator, Representative, or President has the influence, either social or political, of the great railroad kings and the great speculators of the country? How will the public service be promoted by advertising to the country that the offices of the Republic must be filled alone by either the rich, who can live independent of salaries, or by those who can get nothing else to do? How will it be promoted by degrading high intellectual attainment by giving to it the lowest compensation, and placing those who have rendered great and eminent services to science, who have advanced the resources and developed the productions of labor, so that the people may, if the laws will allow them, become prosperous and independent, on a smaller scale of compensation than others who have not so distinguished themselves, and so benefited their people and the whole country? No, this cry of saving money to the tax-payer by degrading the offices of those who serve the people is in the interest of those who would deprive the people of power. So far from reducing taxation, it increases it many hundreds of millions of dollars; it closes all public preferment to the great majority of the people; it takes away the hope of eminent reward and distinction from the son of the poor man.

It affixes poverty and beggary and dependence as the penalty on the poor man for having an honorable ambition to be distinguished in science and to confer benefits on his country and the world by serving them in high public places. The people have no sympathy with such opinions. They honor those among them who have accomplished distinction and are actuated by a real sympathy with them. The people are proud of the attainments of their scientific men, of their learned divines, of their great lawyers, judges, and statesmen. They are not niggardly and mean, and they understand that this cheap economy, this driving good men out of public office by inadequate compensation is in the interest only of the politician who makes public clamor on this subject.

Mr. President, I take no part in these sentiments. I do not sympathize with those who think the tax-payer, the people, are to be deluded with the cry of cheap men at cheap prices, as the great remedy for public evils and the great motive-power for the advancement of the comfort and the social and political interests of the people. They know that in this age science has led labor into new fields of increased production and remuneration.

The hundred thousand workmen who are now demanding what they consider reasonable compensation for labor are not converts to this favorite doctrine of the Senate—cheap labor at cheap prices in all public offices. No, sir; for the statesmen, for the social scientist who will give a practical solution of the problem of distributing production so that labor can be well clothed and comfortably housed and abundantly fed and thoroughly educated and protected in sickness, calamity, and age, they will provide the highest honors and the largest measure of remuneration.

To this great result no bureau and no official of this Government has contributed more than the Geological Bureau, and no man has contributed more to aid in industrial development and prepare new and inviting and profitable fields for labor than Major Powell, for which the committee ask the Senate to punish him by reducing his salary $1,000.

Mr. BECK. The chief clerk of this bureau, I understand, gets $2,400. The House cut him down to $2,000.

Mr. CALL. I was not speaking of the clerk.

Mr. BECK. I make that remark to begin with. Another clerk was cut down in the same way. The Committee on Appropriations restored the salaries of the clerks in this office and allowed the Director of the Geological Survey $5,000. That is all the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] the chairman of the Committee on Finance, is allowed; and it seems to me that $5,000 salary for a place of this sort is ample, and instead of cutting down the subordinate clerks from $2,400 to $2,000 each and keeping him at $6,000, if we give him the salary of a Senator, $5,000, and allow the subordinates to have $2,400 each, we are coming a good deal nearer to doing justice all around than by cutting down the subordinates and allowing the director to have $6,000 instead of $5,000.

Mr. BUTLER. Why do the committee allow $6,000 to the Superintendent of the Coast Survey and $6,000 to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue? Where is the distinction?

Mr. BECK. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue is handling, to begin with, and is responsible for the management of over $135,000,000 a year.

Mr. BUTLER. His services are not more meritorious than those of the Director of the Geological Survey.

Mr. BECK. His services are of a character that may make or detract from the revenues of the Government ten to twenty million dollars a year, dependent upon his management. This bill as we amended it allows the Director of the Geological Survey $5,000 and refuses to strike down the two clerks from $2,400 each to $2,000, as proposed by the House.

Mr. VOORHEES. Has the salary heretofore been $6,000 or $5,000?

Mr. BECK. It was made $5,000 for a gentleman who declined to serve, Clarence King, who was said to be a very worthy man.

Mr. VOORHEES. The gentleman who now occupies the station is fully competent to discharge the duties. If $6,000 was not thought too much for anybody else, it is not too much for the man who now occupies the position.

Mr. BECK. That is a matter of opinion for different Senators. I state the reason why I voted the way I did in committee. I do not believe that the Director of the Geological Survey does any more work or half as valuable work as the Senator from Indiana and myself are required to do, and we have to do our work for $5,000 a year.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky if he thinks that the director, a scientific gentleman, necessarily so, should receive only the same salary that the assistant fish commissioner receives, who need not have any science at all? The bill gives the assistant fish commissioner $5,000 and the Geological Director only $5,000.

Mr. BECK. I do not know anything about the assistant fish commissioner, but the law only gives the Senator from Maine $5,000, and I suppose he is a gentleman who has spent many of the best years of his life in qualifying himself to fill the place he now holds, quite as long as the Director of the Geological Survey did to qualify himself to occupy the place he fills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations to strike out "six" and insert "five," in line 2377.

The question being put, a division was called for, and the ayes were 30.

Mr. BUTLER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to say one word before this vote is taken. Without disclosing anything that occurred in the committee, I may say that I was not in favor of this amendment at first, but finally I did suggest it myself. Mr. Powell is a friend of mine. He is an Illinoisian. I know him well. He is an excellent man, a good man, a scientific man, a man worthy of the confidence of this country. The determination seemed to be to strike down the salary of two of his most important clerks that do the most of the work in that office. They were reduced by the House $400 each, making their salaries $2,000 instead of $2,400. I suggested that it would be well to take a thousand dollars off the salary of the director and put back the $400 on each one of the subordinate officers, who perform a great deal of labor, and that was agreed to by the committee. I think it is fair and I think it is right. I am voting when I vote to do this to cut down the salary of one of my best friends, and I do it because I think it is just to these other men.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I voted for the amendment of the committee, not because I have any want of appreciation of the services of Mr. Powell. I have no doubt he is a very faithful and competent man for the position he occupies; but there is evidently a growing tendency in this country to increase the salaries of the employés of the Government. This very bill I think contains sufficient evidence to satisfy us that there ought to be a check put to this constant increase of the salaries of persons who are engaged in the civil service of the country.

Mr. Powell, I have no doubt is a very competent man for his position, but $5,000 is a pretty fair salary. It is regarded as a fair salary for members of the Senate, and there are not many members of the Senate but have spent their whole lives in acquiring the fitness they possess to occupy the positions they hold here. The members of the Senate occupy positions that require the expenditure of money. I do not refer to political expenses, but they occupy positions that require them to be liberal in their expenditures in other regards.

I do not think that the true interest of this country is in paying heavy salaries to those engaged in the public service. We are a republican government in form; we profess to be republican; we started out with republican simplicity in the origin of our Government, but we are now imitating the crowned heads of Europe in our lavish expenditure of public money. I suppose the expenditures of public money this year will not be much short of $400,000,000. Young as I am, I can remember something of the administration of James Buchanan, when complaints were made against his administration because the expenditures were $60,000,000. My friend from Alabama, [Mr. PUGH,] who remembers further back, perhaps, than I can remember, says that under the administration of Van Buren a great complaint was made because there was an expenditure of $36,000,000. But we are a progressive people. In the last twenty years we have run up from $60,000,000 to about $400,000,000. When we inspect this very bill we find that part of that vast expenditure is in the increased pay allowed to the employés of the Government.

I voted for this amendment of the committee because I believe that the committee, examining this whole question, thought that the salary of $5,000 was sufficient for Mr. Powell, or any person else occupying the position he occupies. We ought to have some reference in the appropriations of the public moneys we make to the tax-payer of the country who pays the money into the Treasury, but the tax-payer is the last man on earth who is thought of. We are putting officers on the retired list, giving them ample salaries, and yet nobody proposes to put the tax-payer on the retired list or to grant him a respite from the burdens under which he has groaned for the last several years.

Let us practice a little economy, pay the public servants what is a fair compensation for their services, and give them nothing beyond what is a proper compensation for the services they render the country.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, when this office was established, after a very careful examination of the whole subject, the salary was fixed at $6,000. It has remained so from that time until now. I never have heard any reason why this officer, remarkable as he is for procuring information and carrying on a work which is thought to be of very great importance for the whole country, to every part of it, has failed in any particular whatever to fulfill all the duties required of that office. When the office was created it was by the consolidation of three offices which in the aggregate gave far higher salaries to their three heads than was given to this one taking their place as the head of these different divisions.

I think the present incumbent of the office, Major Powell, by a long series of most wonderful and active explorations, far beyond those of any man in the whole United States, has earned at least this distinction, that he shall not in the second year of his service have his salary struck down, showing to the American people as well as to himself that he is considered unworthy of the same salary affixed to the office when it was created, and which his predecessor enjoyed while he continued in it, and which he himself has received up to the present time.

It is no sufficient reason for me that the House cut down the salary of other employés under him, and that therefore his salary should be cut down, or that if we restore them to the place where they properly belong we should not restore to him the salary which he has already received. I think it would be a discredit upon the scientific branch of this Government, upon the acquirement of scientific and agricultural and practical knowledge committed to this service, for the United States to cast that blur upon this officer or his office.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to say but a word, and I do it for the purpose of showing something in connection with the history of this office. I did not expect to be drawn into a debate about it, but I happened to be on the committee and happened to be the one that suggested the amendment, and I suppose I shall have to defend myself.

The Senator from Michigan is mistaken in his proposition as to when and how this office was first created. It was called "Director of the Geological Survey," it is true, and put at $6,000. Before that, however, it was an office the same as it is now, but it was not called the "Director of the Geological Survey." It may be well enough to give a little history of this affair, for I think I know as much about it as anybody in the Senate. I say that because I claim to be the originator of the Geological Survey of the United States, as I can demonstrate.

Formerly the geology of the United States was taken by the Engineer Corps. They detailed officers for that purpose, and it was a part of the work of the Army. But in the House of Representatives, at the time I introduced the proposition requiring Army officers to be confined to their legitimate duties, I made a proposition in the appropriation bill appropriating $10,000 for the purpose of establishing a civil geological survey and had Mr. Hayden appointed in that bill by name as the head of the Geological Survey of the United States. From that proposition of mine appropriating $10,000 and appointing Mr. Hayden at the head of the Geological Survey has grown this office that exists to-day. Hayden was at the head of the survey until two years ago, or a little more, when the Secretary of the Interior removed him and appointed Clarence King. When Mr. King's name came before the Senate it is not necessary to speak of what occurred. He was appointed by the Secretary of the Interior and Mr. Hayden was removed from his office, a man who had held it for years. This Geological Survey grew up under Professor Hayden to be what it is to-day almost, and Professor Hayden received $3,500 a year for his services and no more, and never until two years ago did the head of the Geological Survey receive over $3,500 a year.

Professor Hayden for twenty years had traversed the mountains and had done more scientific exploring in reference to discoveries in geology than any man in the United States, but he was removed and King put in his place. When Mr. King became the head of the Geological Survey he undertook to group everything within his office. He came before committees and asked for $400,000—I was present when it was done—tried to increase it, magnify and aggrandize it in a most stupendous form. He finally declined to serve any longer, for the reason that he could not get the amount of money appropriated that he thought was necessary to carry on the survey according to his notions, and in all probability he was right about that. He was certainly a very scientific man—nobody disputes that—but he declined the office. He got the salary increased to $6,000 and then declined the appointment, and Major Powell was appointed in his place. I do not know that I had anything particular to do with his appointment, but I certainly recommended him very strongly for the position. He stepped into it at $6,000. He is a man of science, as I said, a good man and an honest man; but when it comes to cutting down the salary of the men who perform the most of the labor in the office, I do not think it is fair, nor do I think it is right.

Mr. BUTLER. That is restored.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, by a compromise in the committee, cutting this down, and that is the way it was done. I say to Senators here that I have had as much to do in keeping up this Geological Survey and supporting it as any man in this Chamber. As I said, I am the originator of it and the record will show that. There never was such a thing as a geological survey of the United States until I got one established by my own propositions in the House. As I said, this man is my friend. I vote for this amendment because I think it is a better thing for him than to let his salary stand at $6,000 a year. I think it is a better thing for the Geological Survey. I think it is better that the head should not receive so great a salary and the subordinates who do the work be cut down to a small pittance. I think the best thing to satisfy those who do the work, the employés, is to give them a reasonable salary and not give the head of the office an unreasonable salary. That was the consideration that actuated me in committee.

I say this much in defense of my own position in reference to this thing, because I do not want it understood that I have attempted to cut down the salary of a friend of my own, lest some person might think I had a personal pique at him. Not so. I did it because I considered it for the good of the survey, and, more than that, I consulted with men belonging to it before doing it, without giving their names; and I feel safe in saying to-day that every man in that survey, from the head down, is satisfied with what the committee did.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, I did not have the honor to originate any of the great measures of this Government. I regret it very much. It has been my fortune to have been an humble follower of those who originated the great measures, to support what I thought was desirable, and to oppose what I thought was wrong. I thought at least that, not as the creator of these measures, but as one who assisted for several years in perfecting these systems of investigating the regions of the United States which had not before been explored, I might claim the credit of having attempted to do what I could to develop the resources of this great country.

Now, sir, I do not know who originated all these geological surveys. The Senator from Illinois probably did, but I do know that many, many years ago there were surveys across this continent, across the Territories, in the mountains and in the valleys, geological, ornithological, zoological, geodetical, and if I was familiar with all the great leading and high-sounding names which refer to all these examinations I might continue the list.

Why, sir, there are thirteen great volumes mostly taken up with the reports of such surveys, published before I had the honor to have anything to do with public life, in the United States at least, long before the war. I refer to the great railroad explorations, which, when published, opened to the eyes of the people of this country and of the world the most magnificent domain on earth. Long before the time the Senator speaks of, separate appropriations had been made for the Colorado River exploration.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me right there?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. I suppose there is such a thing as fairness, or there ought to be at least, in this Chamber. I did not claim that I originated these surveys at all; I said that prior to this time they were under the Department of War, and that the surveys were made by the Engineer Corps, but that the Geological Survey in the civil department of the Government grew up from my proposition and from my amendment to the bill that passed. That is what I said.

Sir, I do not claim that I originated geological surveys, but I claim that I introduced the first proposition that made this a distinct department of the Government, which is true. I only say to the Senator that his sarcasm is far-fetched when he undertakes to apply to me the insinuation that I claim that I was the originator of all these great things that have been accomplished. No, sir; I do not claim that; nor do I claim to stand high, especially in the estimation of the Senator from Michigan, with himself as the originator of any great proposition.

Mr. CONGER. I accept the apology of the Senator from Illinois, [laughter,] or rather his explanation.

Mr. LOGAN. That is very sharp. That is wit beyond comprehension!

Mr. CONGER. I have said that long years ago these examinations and explorations, geological, geodetic, zoological, ornithological, had been carried on by this Government at great expense. I have said that the exploration of the Colorado River by the incumbent of this office revealed to the world one of the most astonishing and wonderful formations in geology in the excavation of rivers thousands of feet down into the depths of the earth that ever were known. The explorations under the Engineer Department were carried on by different parties. There were the explorations and examinations of Professor Hayden in the civil service of the United States, which I have no doubt the Senator from Illinois, as he says, brought into active practice and originated. I do not doubt it, though I do not remember who did it. It was worthy of him or of any other man that desired to develop the vast resources of the grandest country in the world. A man may well link his name and his memory with the origination and carrying on of those wonderful discoveries and explorations. But, sir, what I did attempt to say in a feeble and perhaps imperfect manner was, that a few years ago there were all these different modes of exploration, the geodetic survey, the triangulation, the explorations under the Engineer Department, the explorations under Professor Hayden, than whom a better or more scientific explorer, perhaps, does not exist, and who was my choice for the place of Director of the Geological Survey when this office was established—all these were going on, and hundreds more. Then Congress saw fit to consolidate all these into one and have them under one head, under the hand and control of a man of superior ability and science and knowledge and enterprise, to move them along together for the general benefit of the American people. Mr. Clarence King was appointed to the office when the office was established, not afterward, the office made by Congress at a salary of $6,000 a year. Mr. Clarence King, after holding the office a time, found he could receive such compensation as a mining geologist exploring the gold and silver mines and determining upon their value as made it undesirable for him longer to continue in this office, and this present incumbent was appointed.

Now, sir, I say, without any disparagement to any other living man in the world, that the enterprise and energy of that one-armed soldier, as he has passed down the rapids of the Colorado, as he has climbed the mountains of the continent, as he has explored the whole range of the formerly unexplored regions of the United States, is a perfect romance; it is a wonder; it is a marvel. There is nothing like it in the explorations of any one man, in the diversity of his operations, in the extent of his discoveries, in his unfolding to the view of the American people the greatness and the grandeur and the mineral wealth and the forestry wealth of the United States; and he did all that on a pitiful compensation, less than a teller in a bank gets, not enough to live upon, not enough to support his family while he was making these explorations, as I have reason to know——

Mr. DAWES. That was in the past?

Mr. CONGER. That was in the past.

Mr. DAWES. But how now?

Mr. CONGER. Now, when the whole system of surveys is consolidated in one, when if ever we want the best man in the country at the head, and it is supposed he has been placed there—at least he was the choice of the Government, and the Senate confirmed him—now when he has served all this time, as if to teach him that he was not worthy of the place or of the salary, his pay is to be cut down without anybody's requesting it that I know of, without a complaint, with nothing but praise for his services, with nothing but the admiration of the American people for the developments which he has made. We do not remove him, we do not abolish the office, but we cut it down to show that really it is not of so much importance as the Congress of the United States once thought it was.

Mr. ALLISON. I agree with all the Senator from Michigan has said with reference to the chief of this survey and the value of his services; but it must be remembered that when this bureau or department was established it was established by making a lump appropriation, fixing only the salary of the chief. We appropriated $100,000, I believe, and fixed the salary of the chief only. Every subordinate had just such compensation as the Secretary of the Interior, with the advice of and on consultation with the chief, fixed. When we came to examine into these salaries we found a proposition from the executive officer, who came to the committee and said: "I ought to have, instead of $3,000, $4,000." The chief executive officer, who is appropriated for here at the rate of $3,000 per annum, said: "Three thousand dollars is not sufficient compensation." He said: "I have been receiving $4,000." Then we examined into the different salaries of these subordinates, and of this chief, and we found that four or five of them have been receiving $4,000 apiece, doing undoubtedly very important work, but receiving for that work a larger pay than is paid by our best colleges for the same character of scientific attainment.

Mr. BUTLER. In what Department?

Mr. ALLISON. In the Interior Department. They are selected by the chief, and Professor Hayden is one of them. Professor Hayden is now and has been in the employ of this Geological Survey nearly all the time, and receives $4,000 per annum, and in addition to that, if I understand it correctly, receives all his expenses while he is in the field. There are four in all that now receive this compensation, and the executive officer has received hitherto $4,000. We said that in our judgment this sum, in comparison with the salaries we are paying to other employés of the Government, is rather more than we ought to pay, but we could not reduce the salary of the subordinates to the chief unless the salary of the chief himself was reduced, and I understand, though I may be mistaken in this, that Major Powell is content with the salary we propose to give him in this bill.

Mr. CALL. I have the pleasure of knowing Major Powell but very slightly. All the information that I have is gathered as a student of his works. Neither have I any connection with the organization of this bureau; but as an American citizen and as a Senator I am proud of the work which has come from him; and I am willing and desire to separate myself broadly from that sentiment that proposes to discriminate against the American citizen of learning and attainments. I think, sir, that it should have no place in the Senate. When an American of this great nation has conferred honor and distinction upon our name, to give him a smaller compensation than is given to those who perform the ordinary duties of the offices of the country is to discriminate against intelligence, nationality, genius, and learning.

Why, sir, any foreign country, as all scientific and cultivated men who will examine his works will agree—I say it, stranger as I am to him—would give him a compensation of the largest proportions and discriminate in favor of his genius that they might encourage others to attain the high eminence which he has won for this scientific department of our Government. No friend of republican institutions or of the people wishes to degrade their public servants. This poor economy, this cheap economy in the name of love of republican institutions, has no just place in any proper patriotic sentiment, in any interest of the National Government or of the States, in any pride in the genius of its achievements or any desire to elevate the poor people of this country to high places of distinction and open the path of promotion to the poor and to all classes of the people.

Why, sir, we must encourage the spirit of learning, of high attainment, and not let it be said that the American Senate, different from foreign and despotic nations, proposes to brand those of her sons who are most eminent in the paths of learning and of science.

The distinguished Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] seems to suppose that this great nation, with fifty millions of people, is what it was thirty years ago, and that for some unexplained reason salaries should be now the same as then, and that competency for the public service was the same then as now.

There is nothing in this suggestion, for we are as different as the Old World was from the New, as different as the duties and necessities of the administration of government for fifty millions of people are from those for twelve or fifteen millions, as different as the economic and social questions which grow out of density of population, of crowded occupation and appropriation of the soil, and of high development of art, of substitution of machinery for labor are from sparsity of population, insufficient occupation of the soil, and easy and equal distribution of production. Then subsistence was cheap and rents low, now it is dear and rents so high that the two exhaust a small income.

It has also been suggested that the salary allowed in the bill is as much as is paid to many scientific men in colleges. But this does not touch the question even in the point of providing the bare necessaries of life as the measure of just compensation for those who serve the people, which is the standard set up in the bill, for the expense of the necessaries of life in Washington and in the country places where colleges usually are bear no comparison to each other.

Another Senator says the committee thought it best to reduce the salary of the chief in order to increase that of his subordinates. But why do injustice to one that justice may be done to another, when the people are willing and able to be just and generous to both?

It is poor economy. It cannot be justified on any ground of reason or right to say that when a man gets an office you may pay him what he is willing to take. Major Powell, I am informed, is as modest as he is intelligent and learned and indefatigable and laborious, and if not content with anything that you give him he doubtless will not complain. But that is not the question. The question is whether we are to degrade American genius and learning and the highest scientific attainments.

I do not know what his predecessors may have been, but I do know that in the estimation of scholars abroad and scientific men at home this man, in his own special subjects, stands chief and head above others, at least in our own country; and, therefore, I as a Senator from one State, wishing to express an appreciation for American learning, for distinguished cultivation, for practical and laborious and successful effort, desire to give him a compensation at least as much as the House bill proposed to allow, and having at least some relation to the value of the results of his labor to all the great industrial interests of the country and the people.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 34, nays 20; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator from Indiana wait till this paragraph is completed, and then I will give way?

Mr. VOORHEES. Very well.

The Acting Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment was, in line 2379, to increase the item of appropriation for compensation to "chief clerk" of the Geological Survey from $2,000 to $2,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2379, before the word "disbursing," to insert "chief;" and in line 2380, after the word "thousand," to insert "four hundred;" so as to read:

Chief disbursing clerk, two thousand four hundred dollars.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2380, after the word "dollars," to strike out "one clerk of class 4 in charge of publications" and insert "librarian, $2,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Acting Secretary continued the reading of the bill to line 2392.

Mr. HALE. Before the Senator from Indiana makes his motion I wish to offer an amendment to the clause just read, so that it may be pending. I move to add to the paragraph:

And no salary or compensation, except such as may be paid under the law to the Director of the Geological Survey, shall be paid or allowed to any person connected with the work of said survey to an amount exceeding $3,000 per annum.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to give notice that to-morrow I shall offer an amendment to line 2405 of the pending bill, increasing the salary of the surveyor general of the Territory of Dakota from $2,000 to $2,500.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. CAMDEN, Mr. FERRY, Mr. HARRIS, Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. JACKSON, and Mr. SAWYER submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R No. 6242) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BECK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BECK. I offer an amendment to the river and harbor bill, asking for the construction of a lock and dam near the mouth of the Licking River, opposite Cincinnati, Ohio, according to the report of the engineer. I move its reference to the Committee on Commerce, and that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES. I offer an amendment to the deficiency appropriation bill, with accompanying papers. I move that the amendment be referred without printing to the Committee on Appropriations, and I ask their especial attention to the matter.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I offer an amendment to the internal-revenue bill, and move its reference to the Committee on Finance and that it be printed.

Mr. BECK. Let that amendment be read. I desire to know what it is.

The Acting Secretary read the proposed amendment, as follows:

That the imposition of an increase of 25 per cent. upon the import duty on the products of cane imposed by section 3 of the act of March 3, 1875, being chapter 127 of the statutes of 1875, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the duty on the products of cane imported into the United States after the passage of this act be restored to the rate prevailing before the passage of said last-mentioned act.

Mr. PLUMB. That is intended, I will say to the Senator from Kentucky, to repeal the 25 per cent. import duty imposed on sugar by the law of 1875 and restore it to the duty that prevailed before the passage of that act.

The amendment was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BECK. I should like to offer an amendment to the same bill. I did not know amendments to it were being offered now. Let it be referred to the Committee on Finance after being read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky to the revenue bill will be read.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act the tariff duty of $28 per ton on Bessemer steel rails shall be reduced to $14 per ton.

The amendment was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

BANKRUPTCY SYSTEM.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 1382) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 28, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HUBBELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire unanimous consent——

Mr. McMILLIN. I demand the regular order. I understand we are going to the consideration of an appropriation bill, and I think nothing ought to intervene to prevent that. Let us get them out of the House as soon as possible.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

AMERICAN CITIZENS IN FOREIGN PRISONS.

Mr. ORTH. I rise to present a privileged report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move to dispense with the morning hour in order, after that is done, to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the naval appropriation bill, and for that reason I raise the question of consideration on the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Indiana.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana submits a report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs which is a privileged report.

Mr. PACHECO. And was recognized by the Chair to submit it.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I hope this matter is not now to be stifled, sir.

The SPEAKER. And against that report the gentleman from New Jersey raises the question of consideration.

Mr. ORTH. The consideration will not occupy ten minutes.

Mr. ROBESON. If the gentleman will insure that, I will not raise the question of consideration.

Mr. ORTH. I will certainly do so, unless overruled by the House.

Mr. ROBESON. But I fear the gentleman cannot control our "rampant lions" on this question.

Mr. ORTH. I think it will take but a short time.

Mr. ROBESON. If we can get unanimous consent of the House that the consideration of this report will not take more than twenty minutes, I shall not interpose any objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the Clerk to read the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, after which the question of consideration may be raised if the gentleman desires.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President is hereby requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to this House any additional correspondence called for by resolution of the 25th of April and not heretofore communicated to Congress; and also whether any proposition has been made by any person holding office under the United States, to any American citizen in British prisons, to accept their release upon conditions; and if so, by whom such proposition was made and the nature thereof.

Mr. ORTH. I move the previous question on the adoption of the report.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understand the question of consideration is raised.

Mr. ROBESON. Not if this will lead to no debate.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I have an amendment I desire to offer. I claim the right to be heard——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not now in order.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I wish to be heard——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot be heard and is not in order at this time.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Will it be in time after the previous question is ordered to offer an amendment?

The SPEAKER. It will not.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I have an amendment to offer which I have the right to present——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana demands the previous question upon the adoption of the report.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I call for the yeas and nays upon that motion. This is an effort to stifle American sentiment.

The SPEAKER, (rapping with his gavel.) The gentleman from New York is not in order.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I will be heard in time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is not in order, and must be seated.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I now respectfully repeat to the Chair that I will be heard in order. This is an effort to stifle all American sentiment, and I will not submit to it. I insist upon——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that he is not at liberty to defy the House and the Chair by saying he will be heard contrary to the rules.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I will be heard in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will resume his seat. The Sergeant-at-Arms will see that the gentleman is seated.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must be seated.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I have a right to be heard when I am in order.

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will require the gentleman to resume his seat if he persists in speaking out of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I think, if the Chair will permit me, that the Chair has misunderstood the remarks of the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman stated that he would be heard, as the Chair understands, in defiance of the Chair.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am satisfied, if the Chair will permit me to say, that the gentleman from New York has been entirely misunderstood. The gentleman stated that he would be heard in order and in time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York now qualifies his statement and says he will be heard in order; but his first declaration was that he would be heard in spite of the Chair.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. The Chair has misunderstood me. I did not say that. I claimed the right to be heard in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was proceeding out of order. The gentleman from New York demands the yeas and nays upon ordering the previous question.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I want to give notice now to the House that I will move to-morrow to impeach the minister at the Court of Saint James, which is a privileged motion; and I shall object to all requests for unanimous consent, and let no motion of that kind pass in this House hereafter until the close of the session.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I shall let no motion pass without a quorum for the remainder of the session.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let the resolution be again read.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be again reported.

The Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. ORTH rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana desire to be heard?

Mr. ORTH. For a moment. I have no desire to enter into any discussion upon this resolution. I am aware of the press of business on the House——

Mr. HISCOCK. Is this debatable?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman has an hour after the ordering of the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not entitled to an hour, but he is entitled under another rule of the House to fifteen minutes.

Mr. ROBESON. As there was no debate previous to the ordering of the previous question, there can be none afterward.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks otherwise. The Clerk will read paragraph 3 of Rule XXVIII:

The Clerk read as follows:

When a motion to suspend the rules has been seconded it shall be in order, before the final vote is taken thereon, to debate the proposition to be voted upon for thirty minutes, one-half of such time to be given to debate in favor of, and one-half to debate in opposition to such proposition, and the same right of debate shall be allowed whenever the previous question has been ordered on any proposition on which there has been no debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks under the latter clause of this rule one-half hour's debate may be had, and a fair interpretation of it is that fifteen minutes should be occupied on each side.

Mr. WILSON. That is right. That is all we ask.

Mr. ORTH. I have no desire myself to debate this proposition. I wish to state to the House that this resolution is the unanimous report of the committee. It simply calls for any additional information which may have been received by the State Department since the last communication. The gentleman from New York is exceedingly desirous of being heard. I told him yesterday that, owing to the press of business and the temper of the House, he could not expect much time. I made the motion for the previous question, believing I understood the rules of the House with regard to the time that was allowed for debate.

Mr. WILSON. What time will you give me?

Mr. ORTH. I desire to yield the fifteen minutes allowed for debate to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON,] and they can divide that time between them.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, so much of the time of this House during the present session has been occupied with the consideration of this question that I desire, by the resolution which I hold in my hand, to bring this subject to a finality, as far as this House is concerned, and test, as far as this House can test it, the meaning of section 2001 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. That section makes it the duty of the President, when any of our citizens are unjustly deprived of their liberty in foreign governments, to demand of such government the reason of such imprisonment; and if the imprisonment appears to be wrongful and in violation of the rights of American citizenship the President shall forthwith demand the release of such citizens.

I will now ask the Clerk to report the following resolution:

Whereas this House has information from the State Department that American citizens are deprived of their liberty under the authority of the Government of Great Britain by being imprisoned in jail in Ireland: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to forthwith demand from the Government of Great Britain the reasons of such imprisonment, (if he be not now in possession of such reasons;) and if it shall appear to him that such imprisonment is wrongful and in violation of the rights of American citizenship, that he shall forthwith demand the release of such citizens, in accordance with precedents and usage which exist between the two governments; and if the release so demanded shall be unreasonably delayed or refused that he use such measures, not amounting to an act of war, as he may think necessary or proper to effect such release, and that he report all the facts and proceedings relative thereto as soon as practicable to Congress.

Mr. McLANE. I suggest to the gentleman to strike out that portion of his resolution containing the words "not amounting to an act of war."

Mr. WILSON. The suggestion of the gentleman from Maryland I think is a good one, and I will cheerfully adopt it. My object was to draft the resolution so as to make it conform as nearly as possible to the section of the statutes to which I have referred. I had not completed the draft of it when the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] had offered the report to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, or I should probably have dropped out the words to which the gentleman from Maryland refers.

The object that I have in view, Mr. Speaker, is to bring this subject to a speedy conclusion, with a view that our fellow-citizens who are now confined in Irish prisons shall have the benefit of such relief as this Government can extend to them.

I should have said, Mr. Speaker, that I had the unanimous consent of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to bring this subject to the attention of the House, and to submit the resolution I have offered with a view of testing the sense of the House upon that subject. It will be borne in mind that section 2000 of the Revised Statutes secures to all naturalized citizens of the United States while in foreign countries the same protection of person and property which is accorded to our native-born citizens. It is therefore immaterial to us here to inquire whether the citizens so unjustly confined in Irish prisons are native-born or naturalized. They occupy the same plane, are entitled to the same protection, and it is the abstract right and duty of this Government to interpose in their behalf.

We owe it to ourselves, we owe it to our nationality, we owe it to the great principles which underlie our republican form of government, to take care that no foreign power shall unjustly seize our citizens, native-born or naturalized, and deprive them of their liberty without sufficient cause. While the statute referred to has clothed the President with full power upon this subject, I think all Congressional interposition in this behalf has rather tended to delay than to facilitate a final conclusion. The President, with becoming modesty, might properly say that he will decline to act when Congress has assumed control of the matter. Send it back to him. Let him make the demand which the law has imposed upon him, and if this demand be inefficient he will report all the facts and proceedings in relation thereto to Congress, and then will be the time for Congress to act.

This is not the first time that this question has occupied the attention of the two countries. On former occasions other citizens of the United States have been imprisoned by Great Britain; and subjects of Great Britain have been arrested and imprisoned by this Government. The books are full of precedents, and those precedents may perhaps amount almost to usage. They will operate as a guide to the President, and, I hope, will enable him to reach a speedy and satisfactory conclusion, by which full and ample justice may be done to our suffering fellow-citizens who have been ruthlessly plunged into British bastiles. The proceedings heretofore taken before our committee have savored too much of inquiry and too little of action. Now, I want to see action, final and definite.

Mr. Speaker, on February 2, 1870, when citizens of the United States were imprisoned in Ireland, Hon. Thomas Swan, of Maryland, then a member of this House and of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in reporting to the House a resolution upon that subject, held the following language:

It is the first duty of a government, Mr. Speaker, to protect her citizens, to throw around them the panoply of her power, and to defend them when assailed, at every sacrifice, against oppression and wrong, come from what source it may.

Not less imperative is the moral duty of friendly remonstrance when the principles of right and justice are forgotten, and nations, like individuals, become blinded by distorted views of their own interest.

I also desired, Mr. Speaker, to quote from the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] some pertinent and appropriate remarks which he made on the same occasion and in the same connection, but I have not the record at hand. And then I desired also to quote from various authors on international law, and from distinguished diplomates of this and other countries, but my limited time will not permit. It is enough to say that it is the right and the high and imperative duty of this Government to throw around our citizens, native or naturalized, at home or abroad, in prison or at liberty, that protection which their personal liberty and right of property demand.

I do not desire to be understood as saying, Mr. Speaker, that if our citizens so confined in British prisons have committed any offense against the laws of that country they should not be tried and punished if found guilty. But this much I do say: that they should have the benefit of speedy and fair trial. If found guilty they are punishable; if not guilty, they are entitled to an immediate release. We can ask nothing more, and we should submit to nothing less.

By the permission of the House I desire to omit from my resolution the words "not amounting to an act of war," as suggested by the honorable gentleman from Maryland. I hope it will be the pleasure of this House to adopt this resolution unanimously. It will, I suppose, supersede the necessity of the State Department furnishing to this House the information called for by the resolution presented by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I ask fifteen minutes to reply to what has been said on the other side.

The SPEAKER The gentleman has seven and a half minutes.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I decline to occupy that time further than to say this: I have here documents which would bring the blush of shame to the face of any American. I have been wanting to get this matter before the House, but the House has refused to listen to it. All kinds of garbage and nonsense about commissions and other less important matters have been considered by the House, and gentlemen after having occupied an hour have had another hour given them, and I cannot have fifteen minutes to state the condition of native as well as adopted citizens now wrongfully imprisoned in British jails.

At this time nine American citizens, instead of five, as was the case when we commenced, are now pining in prison. The President of the United States for a hundred days has been on his knees before Lord Granville, and I can show here by the documents that Lord Granville is spitting in his face and insulting this nation, and refusing to listen to the prayer, not the demand, but the prayer of the President of the United States.

Every possible thing can come in here but a proposition for the relief of these men. Seventeen American citizens have been imprisoned, as guiltless, ay, more guiltless, than you or I, and there they lie in defiance of the President's wish for their release, and no relief is given to them. I can show by the documents here before me that messages are sent from this House to Lord Granville to tell him we are not in earnest here, and to hold fast.

Extracts from the New York Tribune have been sent to Lord Granville by Mr. West, in words as treasonous as ever were uttered by the men that Washington hunted into the sea on Saint Patrick's day in 1776, including the ancestor of this James Russell Lowell, who was a tory, and whose descendant is a tory—all these things I have before me here to show that the New York Tribune's treasonable utterances against American principles are sent by Mr. West, the minister of her majesty here, and inclosed to Lord Granville, telling him that he need not pay any attention to the nonsense of this House; that we do not mean it except to curry favor with the Irish vote.

I have all these things here at my hand to expose the blackest page that ever was written in diplomatic history. And yet I am not to be allowed fifteen minutes to expose these things. I will take an hour on the occasion of the impeachment of this descendant of a tory. And I will object to all measures that come before this House on a request for unanimous consent. And I will sit here for the remainder of the session, and no measure shall pass without a quorum is present, if I am alive. I scorn the seven minutes flung to me here to plead for American citizens who are bleeding and suffering and sickening and dying in filthy English prisons, and no opportunity given to the American Congress except to pass the milk-and-water resolution offered by the chairman of the sub-committee, [Mr. ORTH,] and the other resolution, rather better, but not manly and stalwart enough, offered here by the other member of the committee, [Mr. WILSON.] I decline to degrade American citizenship by taking the seven minutes.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask the gentleman how much further he could go in view of our Constitution than to ask the President to demand their immediate release?

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I offered a resolution to that effect on the 25th of January, in the language the gentleman has now quoted. Can you count from that time till now? January, February, March, April, May, June—all those months have gone by, while nine American citizens are rotting in jail, and there is not sufficient courage here in the American Congress to say whether the British lion's tail shall be wrung or the American eagle's neck twisted. [Laughter.]

Mr. ORTH. Mr. Speaker, as I announced a few minutes ago, I have no desire to occupy the time of the House with any remarks on this resolution. It is a very plain proposition, simply an amendment to the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON,] calling upon the President for certain information. We have changed the phraseology of the resolution, and changed it to the gentleman's entire acceptance.

In conclusion, I only wish to say the diplomatic history of the Government shows fully that the President has not been derelict in his duty with regard to any American citizen imprisoned in Ireland or elsewhere. I now call for the question.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. ORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I now desire to offer the resolution which I have had read.

The SPEAKER. Is this a privileged report?

Mr. WILSON. I have the unanimous consent of the committee to make this report.

A MEMBER. Is it privileged?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know. It is not everything coming from the Committee on Foreign Affairs that is privileged.

Mr. WILSON. I have the authority of the committee to offer the resolution now.

The SPEAKER. Is it a report on a resolution of inquiry referred to the committee?

Mr. WILSON. All that subject was before the committee. It was unanimously agreed that I should have authority to submit this from the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. The action of the committee, as I understood, was a bare permission that the gentleman from West Virginia might present this resolution as his own.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it is a privileged report.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the resolution will be allowed to come in now for the purpose of having this subject disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to allowing the gentleman to submit this resolution for consideration?

Mr. WILSON. I will ask no time to discuss it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas this House has information from the State Department that American citizens are deprived of their liberty under the authority of the Government of Great Britain by being imprisoned in jail in Ireland: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President be, and is hereby, requested to forthwith demand of the Government of Great Britain the reasons for such imprisonment, if he be not now in possession of such reasons; and if it shall appear to him that such imprisonment is wrongful, and in violation of the rights of American citizenship, that he shall forthwith demand the release of such citizens; and if the release so demanded shall be unreasonably delayed or refused, that he use such measures as he may think necessary and proper to obtain or effect such release; and that he report all the facts and proceedings relative thereto as soon as practicable to Congress.

Mr. WILSON. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ROBESON. I move that the morning hour for the presentation of reports of committees be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

HUSBANDRY OF THE ANGORA GOAT.

Mr. VAN HORN. I rise to make a privileged report. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back without amendment the joint resolution (S. R. No. 58) to print Dr. John L. Hayes's pamphlet upon the husbandry of the Angora goat.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the Commissioner of Agriculture be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to employ Dr. John L. Hayes to prepare for publication his pamphlet upon the husbandry of the Angora goat, and to have 10,000 copies of the same printed for distribution—3,000 by the Senate and 7,000 by the House of Representatives.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VAN HORN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CATALOGUE OF GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 329) to authorize the preparation and publication of a classified, analytical, and descriptive catalogue of all Government publications from July 4, 1776, to March 4, 1881, be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Printing.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Several members called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. A number of gentlemen desire to submit reports; but the regular order being called for, the Chair cannot recognize anything except privileged matters.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the naval appropriation bill; but pending that motion, I will yield to gentlemen on each side for the presentation of reports.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

Mr. KASSON, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 3580, a bill (H. R. No. 6682) to fix the salary of the collector of customs of the district of Chicago, Illinois; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CONTESTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. KASSON also, by unanimous consent, reported back without amendment, from the Committee on Civil Service Reform, the bill (H. R. No. 6379) to charge the Court of Claims with certain duties in cases of contested elections; which was placed on the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JULIA A. NUTT.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. No. 1472) for the relief of Julia A. Nutt, widow and executrix of Heller Nutt, deceased. This bill met, I believe, the unanimous approbation of the Senate committee. I trust there will be no objection to its immediate passage.

Mr. HISCOCK. I shall be compelled to call for the regular order, and allow no further business to be done except the introduction of reports.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thought the gentleman from Mississippi wished to submit a report.

Mr. HOOKER. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. HISCOCK. I must object.

Mr. HOOKER. Very well; send the bill back. I shall hereafter object to the consideration of anything except the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion submitted by the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. ROBESON. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of taking up and considering the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. HOOKER. I give notice to the House that I shall join my friend from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON,] and that I shall object to anything except the regular order.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a bill (S. No. 1128) to authorize the Secretary of State to allow for expenditures within named to James Rea, late consul at Belfast, Ireland; when the Speaker signed the same.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ROBESON. I insist on my motion to go into the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, (Mr. PAGE in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole, and the first business in order is the bill (H. R. No. 6616) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes. The Clerk will read the bill the first time for information.

Mr. ROBESON. I move that the first reading of the bill for information be dispensed with.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York object to dispensing with the first reading of the bill for information.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Yes, I object to it.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I now ask that the further reading of the bill for information be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the first reading of the bill is dispensed with.

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Chairman, this bill as presented from the Committee on Appropriations appropriates the sum of $15,351,996.70.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. What has become of my objection?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] asked unanimous consent after the Clerk had commenced reading the bill that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with. The Chair in a loud tone of voice called for further objection and there was no response.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I have not withdrawn my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. It is too late.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I know it is a matter——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is on the floor, and objection now comes too late.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. It will only give more trouble hereafter. I shall be more on my watch hereafter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asked for further objection in a loud tone of voice, and there was no response in any part of the House.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Some gentleman was speaking to me to withdraw it. At the time I intended to withdraw it, but hereafter I shall be more on my guard.

Mr. ROBESON. This sum of money amounts to less than $365,000 beyond the appropriations which have been made for the service of the last fiscal year. By the terms of the bill the money is applied in the ordinary way, except that the application of the money appropriated for the Bureau of Construction and Repair and the Bureau of Steam-Engineering of the Navy is so regulated that certain portions of them may be used for certain specific purposes according to the recommendations of the committee. The bill accomplishes this purpose without any large increase of contemplated expenditure during the coming fiscal year, by reducing the expenditure upon other parts of the service where, in the opinion of the committee, it can be dispensed with without injury or inconvenience.

The bill also contains a large reduction in the future of the number, and naturally of the expense, not only of the military but of the civil establishment of the Navy; because the difficulty in the past has been, that while the country has been not wholly illiberal in its appropriations for the Navy, the naval establishment itself has been and is so large that it consumes all for the personnel and movement of the naval service and leaves nothing for the material increase of the Navy itself.

This defect your committee have endeavored to remedy, and in doing so it has been necessary to cut somewhat the public service. But your committee had entered upon that task, always an ungrateful and a difficult one, with the fixed determination to do no injury, but only good. The service is congested. It is too much by the head, as the sailors say; it is too top-heavy. It must take medicine if it is to be relieved, and it is no answer for the child of the Government to say, I will not take medicine, I would rather die.

We have also endeavored in this blil to put the Department and the service in the way of great future economy, by recommending and enforcing upon them, as far as they may think it wise, the propriety of concentrating all their work at fewer and more appropriate points, to the end that the large civil estimates which are necessary to be carried on in various parts of the country under the present system may be, in time, reduced, and the money appropriated to the service more directly applied to its immediate and legitimate objects.

For this purpose we have cut down the whole appropriation for the civil service of the Navy just one-half. It may be that that was cutting too deeply; but your committee think not. If it should, however, turn out to be so; if in the opinion of Congress, when the subject is tried, it turns out to be too heavy, the remedy is of course in the hands of the legislative power. But you can never cut down the growing civil service of any country unless you try to do it. You can never bring it down to the proper level unless you apply the knife with a firm and skillful hand.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey, if he will permit me, if the idea of the committee is to close up some of the present navy-yards?

Mr. ROBESON. If the gentleman from Georgia will read the bill he will see that we have said if the Secretary of the Navy regards it as unwise or impossible to carry on the work at all of the navy-yards now maintained, upon the money we have appropriated, which is just one-half of the sum appropriated last year, then he shall not make a deficiency for that purpose, but shall close those yards which he finds can be best dispensed with for the interest of the Government, and concentrate and carry on the work in the others. We do not pretend to say which are the proper yards to be closed. There are many questions which enter into the determination of that question. The question of climate enters into it. Sometimes it is necessary to have a northern yard to be used as a refuge to check the ravages of tropical diseases. At some seasons of the year it is necessary to have a southern yard to avoid the interference of ice and allow work to go on in cold weather. In our condition it is proper and economical to have stations and yards near the points of interest for ready remedy.

All these questions, including so much and with so many conflicting considerations, involving the whole consideration of our coast line, our immediate necessities, our general service over the country, extending through all degrees of latitude from the frigid to the tropical sections of the world, we have left to the consideration and the determination and to the trial of the executive department to meet these difficulties and determine its conduct. But we have insisted, so far as an appropriation committee can insist, that the eight navy-yards and stations on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts shall be reduced in time of peace; not that they shall be destroyed, not if the work of material improvement, if necessary, or the work of building up yards for future operations shall be discontinued, but that work in these scattered yards shall not necessarily be carried on in time of peace.

Mr. Chairman, I have gone generally over the subject-matter of this bill. It has been for a considerable time before the House printed with its report. It has excited some interest and is generally understood. Time is not now more abundant than we desire, and therefore, not wishing myself to make any other than this general statement in the beginning of the consideration of the bill, I shall now move——

Mr. CALKINS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment before he makes the motion. I wish to ask simply a question.

Mr. ROBESON. Certainly.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to ask the gentlemen from New Jersey a question or two. I notice in the bill an item of $2,000,000, or about that, appropriated for the purpose of finishing some monitors that have been laid up for several years; and I wish principally to ask the gentleman from New Jersey whether or not in his judgment the time has not already passed when this class of vessels are of any very great importance in the naval service of this or any other country? Whether the improvements in arms and armament for the last three or four years have not demonstrated that this class of vessels is now out of date; and I want to hear the gentleman upon that subject, because an appropriation of this sum to be put upon some vessels which when completed would be of no practical benefit, if that be true, is a matter which the House ought to be informed upon, and I would be glad to hear the gentleman's theory upon that subject.

The gentleman from New Jersey will allow me to make one further statement. We have of course no coast defenses; we ought to have some. These monitors, if completed, as I understand it, will answer neither as harbor defenses nor for the purposes of being seaworthy and being sent abroad; that is, taking into consideration the improvements that have been made recently in that service. I should like to hear the gentleman from New Jersey on that subject.

Mr. ROBESON. I shall be glad to speak on that subject; but I do not want to enter on it fully just now.

Mr. CALKINS. All I want is that general debate shall not close until we have heard the gentleman's views on that subject.

Mr. ROBESON. I do not desire that general debate shall close now. I only want to have the time fixed when general debate shall close.

I will say to the gentleman at this time, however, that these monitors for which we now appropriate a million dollars—not two millions—for the purpose of launching them from the yards of the contractors in which they are for the purpose of finishing their engines and machinery, are the accepted type which the experience of all the maritime nations of the world has adopted as the most efficient vessels for the purpose of harbor and coast defenses. They are not vessels that always please the naval officers, because they do not belong to that great class of sea-going iron-clads that sail around the world carrying each a thousand men and making the dignity and circumstance of an admiral of the Navy, and representing the power of this Government around the world. But for the defensive purposes of a peaceful nation, with harbors like ours, with exposed ports like ours, I say to the gentleman what I know when I say it, and what he himself will be convinced of when he has examined it, that all the naval powers of the world for those purposes have come back to the type of the iron-clad monitor.

Mr. CALKINS. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. ROBESON. Certainly; that is the first point.

Mr. CALKINS. I will wait till you have spoken of the other point.

Mr. ROBESON. What was your second point?

Mr. CALKINS. The point I was about to call the gentleman's attention to is this: in the very limited time I have had, and in the general way I have examined the matter, I have observed that almost all the naval officers of experience, not only in this country but throughout the world, agree that harbor and coast defenses in the future must be provided for, not by monitors or by iron-clads or the like, but by these tremendous rams, the torpedoes, and the improved guns; that the navies of the world hereafter will not consist of vessels that will sail into harbors and batter down the forts; that is past, and I cannot conceive of any purpose that these monitors could be put to save those that we put them to during the war; and that time has gone, as I understand it, and gone forever. I understand that hereafter we must depend in our defenses upon these improved rams and torpedoes and these improved guns that now throw a projectile that will go through eight inches of solid iron. No vessel can stand that. And I am sure the gentleman from New Jersey will not claim for these monitors that they will be able to live a moment, so to speak, beneath such a fire as I have described. And if they cannot, and if they are not good to go to sea, then, in the name of God, of what use are they? That is what I want to know.

Mr. ROBESON. I do not desire now to go into the general discussion of this question. The gentleman from Indiana, by his inquiries, has forced me out of my original intention not to enter upon these questions at this particular time. But I want to say now that in the first place what the gentleman says is generally true. Torpedoes will be a great protection to harbors and coasts. But they are not and cannot be the only protection.

Mr. CALKINS. I did not say the only protection.

Mr. ROBESON. The gentleman will admit that forts, with whatever ordnance you have, will be a great protection to harbors, but they cannot be the only protection, for they are stationary, and experience has shown that vessels of rapid movement, at night, and under favorable circumstances, may pass them. It is necessary for the complete defense of our coasts and harbors that we should have floating batteries, which these monitors are, that will take exactly the position which is needed, that will meet everything that comes, that will carry the heavy guns which the gentleman speaks of, that will resist the shot which the gentleman speaks of, and these will do both—and which are themselves the rams which the gentleman requires. These monitors as planned and as we propose to finish them are rams in the first instance of great power.

Mr. CALKINS. What power? What blow will they strike?

Mr. ROBESON. Why they will strike a blow such as, when it strikes a vessel, will sink any vessel in the world.

Mr. CALKINS. How many pounds?

Mr. ROBESON. The tonnage of these vessels, of some of them, is 5,000 tons. Nothing can stand before them. They will carry these guns which pierce this iron; they will resist the shot themselves. They will be of such a draught, of such a character, that they will be able to engage and destroy, if necessary, any iron-clad of any naval power in the world that is able to cross the 3,000 miles of stormy ocean and enter our harbors. But I do not propose to say anything more about that now.

Mr. CALKINS. I want to ask the gentleman another question on another point.

Mr. ROBESON. I do not want to get into general discussion until we fix the time for closing general debate.

Mr. CALKINS. I do not want to interfere now with the course of action proposed by the gentleman; but I wanted to ask if he intended to speak further on the bill at a future time. If so, I desire to get some further information with reference to the bill, because, if possible, of course I should like to assist in passing it; but if wrong, I should like to assist in trying to amend it, and as at present advised, unless the gentleman is able to satisfy me on some features of the bill, I must necessarily try to have the bill amended.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire now, having made this general statement, which is much longer than I intended it should be, to move that the committee rise, that the House may fix a time for general debate.

Mr. O'NEILL. What time?

Mr. ROBESON. For myself I have no desire to limit it, but I want the House to fix the time. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. ATKINS. I would suggest to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] that he had better let the debate run for a few hours, and then we can better determine what limit to put upon it.

Mr. O'NEILL. I want to make the same suggestion to my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. ROBESON.] The fixing now the limit for general debate will embarrass a great many gentlemen, because from what I can learn throughout this House there is to be a long debate on this bill, and I think very properly so. This is a bill to uproot the Navy of the United States, to destroy the Navy of the United States, not only in reference to the men of the Navy but to the means of increasing our Navy, if such increase shall be necessary. I therefore hope the gentleman will not now ask for a limit to general debate.

Mr. ROBESON. There are other reasons of an important character which the Committee on Foreign Affairs have suggested to me why the committee should now rise. I will not attempt to limit debate more than the House may desire; I have no desire myself to limit the debate, I only want to obtain the opinion of the House upon the subject. I therefore move that the committee rise.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 73, noes 12.

So (no further count being called for) the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

Mr. PAGE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6616) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. ROBESON. I understand that the Committee on Foreign Affairs, by reason of some mistake in the wording of a resolution adopted this morning, have got into some difficulty, which they wish to correct at once. I will therefore yield the floor for that purpose.

AMERICAN CITIZENS IMPRISONED IN IRELAND.

Mr. WILSON. In the hurry of making the draft of the resolution this morning there was omitted these words: "in accordance with such precedents and usages as exist between the two governments." I ask consent to have those words inserted in the resolution which I offered.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I suggest to my friend that he had better let it stand in the weak sense it now has.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I object.

Mr. WILSON. I rise to a question of privilege. Some time ago my friend said——

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Well, I will withdraw my objection, though I wish he would let it stand as it is.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] asks consent to have inserted in the resolution which was adopted on his motion the words which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In accordance with such precedents and usages as exist between the two governments.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. That is all nonsense.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not object, but I would like to inquire whether this is the resolution the House adopted some time ago?

The SPEAKER. It is a resolution which the House adopted to-day.

Mr. COX, of New York. This morning?

The SPEAKER. This morning.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. It is simply weakening in the face of the enemy; that is all.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I desire to say, in justice to the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. WILSON,] that the moment his attention was called to the omission, which is important if not vital, he said he would correct it.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. It is simply weakening in front of the enemy.

Mr. WILSON. It was left out in the hurry of copying the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the words will be inserted.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ROBESON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the naval appropriation bill. Pending that motion, I desire to ask gentlemen on the other side of the House and on this how much time they would like to have for general debate.

Mr. ATKINS. So far as I am concerned, having been upon the sub-committee with the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] I desire very little time; not more than ten or fifteen minutes perhaps. But there are other gentlemen on this side of the House who, I am informed, desire to discuss this question at length. I think, therefore, the best plan would be to allow debate to proceed for a time, and then we can determine better as to the limit to be placed upon general debate than we can now.

Mr. ROBESON. I will say to my colleague on the committee [Mr. ATKINS] that in the present condition of affairs I think we had better fix the time, giving all the time that may be wanted, in order that the House may know pretty nearly what it is to do. I would like to have some suggestions as to what limit shall be made.

Mr. ATKINS. I will say to the gentleman that there are two members of the House now absent who I understand desire to discuss this subject, and they will not be here to-day.

Mr. ROBESON. I am perfectly willing to give all the time necessary to gentlemen who desire to speak; but I am not willing to extend the time for general debate for the purpose of accommodating those who are absent when they come back.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ROBESON. I will do so.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I will say to the gentleman from New Jersey that I expected to take part in this debate, and to be ready to go on to-day; but I am in such a condition of health that I find it absolutely impossible to do so. I trust the gentleman from New Jersey will so arrange matters that I may get the floor to-morrow.

Mr. ROBESON. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman from New York should speak to-morrow by special agreement. I do not want to concede that we are going to continue general debate on this bill for the next two days; but I am perfectly willing that the gentleman from New York, if not able to speak to-day, shall be allowed to speak to-morrow by general consent, notwithstanding the previous closing of the general debate. For the purpose of determining this question, I move that general debate on this bill be closed—is there no suggestion from the other side?

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman allow suggestions from this side?

Mr. ROBESON. Certainly. I wanted to hear from the other side first. If there is no suggestion from that side, I will hear from gentlemen on this side.

Mr. ATKINS. I think the gentleman from New Jersey must now see the propriety of my suggestion to allow this debate to proceed for the present without limitation. It may be closed much sooner by not fixing a time than by fixing a time.

Mr. BOWMAN. I desire to make a suggestion. It is perhaps superfluous to state that this is a very important bill. I should say in justice to the committee that it is really not an appropriation bill with legislation ingrafted on it, but a legislation bill with an appropriation ingrafted on it—a bill changing vital principles concerning the Navy. I think it ought to be fully discussed. It seems to me the gentleman can afford for a little while at least to let the debate run on until the full scope of the question is ascertained and the measure understood. I hope the gentleman will not insist to-day on limiting debate.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman from New Jersey permit another suggestion? The House has agreed to a resolution that Congress adjourn on the 10th of July. Now, while gentlemen here are so anxious to be heard upon this bill, I wish to suggest to them in the interest of all of us who want to get away from here, that there should be as much economy of time as possible. Cannot these gentlemen get through to-day?

The SPEAKER. There is no question pending before the House.

Mr. ROBESON. For the purpose only of testing the sense of the House, I move that general debate be closed to-day at five o'clock, reserving to the gentleman from New York the right to speak to-morrow if he should not be able to speak to-day.

Mr. ATKINS. So far as I am concerned—I do not know that I have any more right to speak on the subject than any one else, but having been on the sub-committee with the gentleman from New Jersey I take the liberty to do so——

Mr. ROBESON. You have every right that I have.

Mr. ATKINS. From what I have heard from various gentlemen around me, I am satisfied that the House will not be willing to close debate at five o'clock this evening, reserving only to the gentleman from New York the right to speak to-morrow.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. The question can be tested in one moment by a vote of the House.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not believe that the experience of the House has created any sentiment in favor of allowing general debate to run upon any public measure without a limit being fixed at the outset. We have had a great deal of that sort of thing in this House, and if I know anything about the sentiment of the House it is against any further continuance of that practice. I therefore move as an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey that general debate on this bill be closed at four o'clock this evening.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will say to the gentleman from New York that it will not be satisfactory to this side of the House to fix any time to-day for closing this debate. At least six gentlemen on this side desire to speak, and will require an hour each. If the majority should force this bill to a vote before fair discussion is had upon it they must expect that it will be resisted on this side of the House by the breaking of a quorum.

Mr. HISCOCK. I wish to say a single word in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.] There is no intention on the part of any gentleman on this side to prevent full and fair discussion of this and all other questions. After what the gentleman has said it is entirely proper that we should have a vote upon this question to see how far he represents the sentiment of members upon the other side of the House in the expression which he has just made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey moves that when the House shall go into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill, general debate close at five o'clock to-day; which motion the gentleman from New York moves to amend by striking out "five" and inserting "four."

Mr. ROBESON. I have also moved that the right be reserved to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] to speak to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter for unanimous consent.

Mr. HISCOCK. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. TALBOTT. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] if he will allow me.

Mr. ROBESON. Certainly.

Mr. TALBOTT. I suggest that we fix two o'clock to-morrow as the hour for closing general debate.

Mr. ANDERSON. Then there will be the five-minute debate after that.

A MEMBER. That you cannot avoid.

Mr. TALBOTT. I suggest that to-morrow at two o'clock be fixed for closing the debate. That will give everybody who wants to speak a chance to do so.

A MEMBER. Say one o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. TALBOTT. No; I suggest two o'clock.

Mr. BOWMAN. I move to amend by providing that the general debate shall close to-morrow at four o'clock.

Mr. TALBOTT. I made my suggestion as a compromise.

Mr. ROBESON. I will accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Maryland, and agree to two o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey modifies his motion so as to fix the time when general debate shall close at two o'clock to-morrow. The question will be on that motion, that all general debate on the naval appropriation bill shall close to-morrow at two o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROBESON moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the time for closing general debate is fixed for to-morrow at two o'clock, without reference to any arrangement as to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] suggested by the gentleman from New Jersey earlier in this proceeding.

The SPEAKER. No arrangement could be made without unanimous consent.

Mr. HISCOCK. The reason I make this suggestion is that we may now understand it, so that in the distribution of time, as it is only fair, the gentlemen who favor this bill should have the close of the debate.

The SPEAKER. No arrangement has been made.

ROCK ISLAND AND SOUTHWESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. ROBESON. I now move to go into committee.

Mr. McCOID. I rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 1810) to authorize the Rock Island and Southwestern Railway Company to construct a bridge over the Mississippi River at New Boston, State of Illinois, and to pass it in lieu of the one passed the other day by the House. I will say that I have to go away to-night, and will be gone until next week. I ask, therefore, as a special favor, to be allowed to pass this Senate bill in lieu of the one passed by the House the other day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to taking up the Senate bill?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I object.

Mr. ROBESON. I insist on my motion then, to go into committee for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. McCOID. I think objection will be withdrawn to taking up the Senate bill.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I will withdraw my objection if it will give rise to no debate.

Mr. McCOID. It will not, I think.

The SPEAKER. This purports to be the same bill the House passed a few days ago. Is it the desire of the House that the bill shall be read?

Mr. HOLMAN. These are important matters, and I ask that the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be lawful for the Rock Island and Southwestern Railway Company, a corporation organized under the general incorporation laws of the State of Illinois, its successors and assigns, to construct, under and subject to the conditions and limitations hereinafter provided, a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of New Boston, and lay on and over said bridge a railway track or tracks, for the more perfect connection of its road to be constructed, and such other roads as may now be or hereafter may be constructed to said river from its east and west banks, and to build and lay on and over said bridge ways for wagons and vehicles of all kinds, and for the transit of passengers on foot, and also of live stock, for such reasonable rates of toll as may be approved from time to time by the Secretary of War, and to keep up and maintain said bridge for the purposes aforesaid: Provided, That Congress may at any time prescribe such rules and regulations in regard to toll and otherwise as may be deemed reasonable.

SEC. 2. That said bridge shall be built with a draw, so as not to impede the navigation of said river; said draw shall be a pivot draw, over the channel of said river usually navigated, and with spans of not less than two hundred feet in length in the clear on each side of the central or pivot pier of the draw, and the next adjoining span or spans shall not be less than two hundred and fifty feet, and said spans shall not be less than ten feet above extreme high-water mark and not less than thirty feet above low-water mark, measured to the bottom chord of the bridge, and the piers of said bridge shall, as nearly as practicable, be parallel with the current of said river: Provided, That said draw shall always be opened promptly upon reasonable signal; and said company, or its successors and assigns, shall at all proper times keep and maintain all proper lights on said bridge during nights, so that its presence may always be noticed by vessels and craft navigating the channel of said river. And all plans for the construction of said bridge and approaches thereto must first be submitted to the Secretary of War for his approval; and when the same shall be approved by said Secretary the work thereon may be commenced and prosecuted to completion: And provided further, That said bridge shall, as nearly as may be, be constructed at right angles with said river or the current thereof: And provided further, That any change in the mode of construction of said bridge shall be first submitted to the said Secretary for his approval, and when approved the said company may then proceed with the construction according to said change: And provided further, That if said bridge when constructed shall, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, be a substantial obstruction to the navigation of said river, the said Secretary shall require said company to change the construction thereof so as to avoid any serious and substantial obstruction to the navigation of said river, at the expense of the owners of said bridge.

SEC. 3. That the bridge hereby authorized shall be a lawful structure, and shall be a post-route, upon which no higher charge shall be made for the transportation of the mails of the United States and the troops and munitions of war, or for passengers or freight passing over said bridge, than the rate per mile paid to railroads and transportation companies leading to said bridge.

SEC. 4. That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains or cars over the same, and over the approaches thereto, upon payment of a reasonable compensation for such use; and in case the owner or owners of said bridge and the several railroad companies, or any one of them, desiring such use shall fail to agree upon the sum or sums to be paid, and upon rules and conditions to which each shall conform in using said bridge, all matters at issue between them shall be decided by the Secretary of War upon a hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties: Provided, That the provisions of section 3 in regard to charges for passengers and freight across said bridge shall not govern the Secretary of War in determining any question arising as to the sum or sums to be paid to the owners of said bridge by said companies for the use of said bridge.

SEC. 5. That this act shall be subject, except as above mentioned, to the limitations and provisions of an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the town of Clinton, in the State of Iowa, and other bridges across said river, and to establish them as post-roads," approved April 1, 1872.

SEC. 6. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, on satisfactory proof that a necessity exists therefor, to require the company or persons owning said bridge to cause such aids to the passage of said bridge to be constructed, placed, and maintained, at their own cost and expense, in the form of booms, dikes, piers, or other suitable and proper structures for the guiding of rafts, steamboats, and other water-craft safely through the passage-way, as shall be specified in his order in that behalf; and on failure of the company or persons aforesaid to make and establish such additional structures within a reasonable time, the said Secretary shall proceed to cause the same to be built or made at the expense of the United States, and shall refer the matter without delay to the Attorney-General of the United States, whose duty it shall be to institute, in the name of the United States, proceedings in any district court of the United States in which such bridge, or any part thereof, is located, for the recovery of the cost thereof; and all moneys accruing from such proceedings shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 7. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved. And the right to require any changes in said structure or its entire removal at the expense of the owners thereof whenever Congress shall decide that the public interest requires it, is also expressly reserved.

There was no objection; and the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, ordered to a third reading, and accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McCOID moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE ARKANSAS RIVER.

Mr. GUNTER. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 1020, to allow the Saint Louis and San Francisco Railroad Company to construct a bridge across the Arkansas River, and put it upon its passage.

Mr. GODSCHALK. I object.

Mr. GUNTER. I hope the gentleman will not object. This bill is similar to the one just passed. The railroad company is ready to do the work, the rest of their line being nearly completed, and they want to commence work at once.

Mr. GODSCHALK. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Saint Louis and San Francisco Railway Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Missouri, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, or cause to be constructed, and maintain, a bridge and approaches thereto over the Arkansas River at the town of Van Buren, Crawford County, Arkansas. Said bridge shall be constructed to provide for the passage of railway trains, and at the option of the corporation by which it may be built may be used for the passage of wagons and vehicles of all kinds, for the transit of animals, and for foot passengers, for such reasonable rates of tolls as may be approved from time to time by the Secretary of War as to railway trains, and as to wagons, vehicles, animals, and foot-passengers, such rates as may be provided by the laws of Arkansas.

SEC. 2. That any bridge built under this act is subject to its limitations, shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post-route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States, and for passengers or freight passing over the said bridge, than the rate per mile paid for the transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to the said bridge; and it shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post-roads in the United States.

SEC. 3. That said bridge shall be constructed with a draw or pivot span, which shall be over the main channel of the river at an accessible navigable point, and the openings on each side of the pivot-pier shall be not less than one hundred and sixty feet in the clear, and, as nearly as practicable, both of said openings be accessible at all stages of the water; that the spans shall not be less than ten feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, to the lowest part of the superstructure of said bridge; that the piers and draw-rests of said bridge shall be built parallel with the currents at that stage of the river which is most important for navigation; and that no riprap or other outside protection for imperfect foundations be permitted to approach nearer than four feet to the surface of the water at its extreme low stage, or otherwise to encroach upon the channel-ways provided for in this act: Provided, That said draw shall be opened promptly by said company, upon reasonable signal, for the passage of boats; and said company or corporation shall maintain at its own expense, from sunset till sunrise, such lights or other signals on said bridge as the Light-House Board shall prescribe. No bridge shall be erected or maintained under the authority of this act which shall at any time substantially or materially obstruct the free navigation of said river; and if any bridge erected under such authority shall, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, obstruct such navigation, he is hereby authorized to cause such change or alteration of said bridge to be made as will effectually obviate such obstruction; and all such alterations shall be made and all such obstructions be removed at the expense of the owner or owners of said bridge. And in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said river, caused or alleged to be caused by said bridge, the case may be brought in the district court of the United States of the State of Arkansas in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge may be located: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to repeal or modify any of the provisions of law now existing in reference to the protection of the navigation of rivers, or to exempt this bridge from the operation of the same.

SEC. 4. That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains over the same, and over the approaches thereto, upon payment of a reasonable compensation for such use; and in case the owner or owners of said bridge and the several railroad companies, or any of them desiring such use, shall fail to agree upon the sum or sums to be paid and upon the rules and conditions to which each shall conform in using said bridge, all matters at issue between them shall be decided by the Secretary of War, upon a hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties: Provided, That the provisions of section 2, in regard to charges for passengers and freight across said bridge shall not govern the Secretary of War in determining any questions arising as to the sum or sums to be paid to the owners of said bridge by the said companies for the use of said bridge.

SEC. 5. That any bridge authorized to be constructed under this act shall be built or commenced and located under and subject to such regulations for the security of navigation of said river as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and to secure that object the said company or corporation shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawings of the bridge and a map of the location, giving for the space of one mile above and one mile below the proposed location the topography of the banks of the river, the shore-lines at high and low water, the direction and strength of the currents at all stages, and the soundings, accurately showing the bed of the stream, the location of any other bridge or bridges, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject; and until the said plan and location of the bridge are approved by the Secretary of War the bridge shall not be built or commenced; and should any change be made in the plan of said bridge during the progress of construction such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 6. That whenever the Secretary of War shall have good reason to believe that the bridge hereby authorized to be constructed is an obstruction to the free navigation of said waters, by reason of difficulty in passing the draw-opening of said bridge of rafts, steamboats, or other water craft, it shall be the duty of the said Secretary of War, on satisfactory proof thereof, to require the company or persons owning such bridge to cause such aids to the passage of said draw-openings to be constructed, placed, and maintained at their own costs and expense in the form of booms, dikes, piers, or other suitable and proper structures for the guiding of said rafts, steamboats, or other water craft safely through said opening as shall be specified in his order in their behalf; and on failure of the company or persons aforesaid to make and establish such additional structures within a reasonable time, the said Secretary of War shall proceed to cause the same to be built or made at the expense of the United States and shall refer the matter without delay to the Attorney-General of the United States, whose duty it shall be to institute in the name of the United States proceedings in the district court of the United States in which said bridge or any part thereof is located, for the recovery of the cost thereof, and all moneys accruing from such proceedings shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 7. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved, and the right to require any changes in said structure or its entire removal, at the expense of the owners thereof, whenever Congress shall decide that the public interest requires it, is also expressly reserved.

The bill was read a first and second time, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GUNTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

J. H. KETCHAM,
FRANK HISCOCK,
WM. H. FORNEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. KETCHAM] please state the effect of the recommendations of the committee of conference?

Mr. KETCHAM. I will state that the bill as agreed to by the committee of conference appropriates about $12,000 less than the bill as it originally passed the House.

The report of the committee of conference was adopted.

Mr. KETCHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ROBESON. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, (Mr. PAGE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6616) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ROBESON. How much time have I consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey has used seventeen minutes of his hour.

Mr. ROBESON. I reserve for the present the remainder of my time.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not expect to occupy the attention of the committee very long at this time; but being a member of the sub-committee which prepared this bill, I have thought it due to the committee, to the House, and to the country, that I should give some explanation of my views on the bill.

I frankly say I agree to many of the propositions which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] calls legislation and which are correctly so described that are contained in the bill. There are a great many reforms in this bill; I will refer to them in a moment. Before, however, doing so, I propose to notice the amount appropriated in the bill. It carries $15,351,996.70. The bill of last year carried $14,566,037.55. There is a deficiency for this year of $393,130. That deficiency is not justly chargeable to the appropriation of last year. Indeed, I will say in general terms that every year ought to be charged with its own deficiency. This appropriation was made last year, in the year 1881, for the year 1882; and the Departments have exceeded what was appropriated by Congress by the amount of $393,000. That should not be added, as it is added in the report which has been submitted to the House by the chairman of the sub-committee, to the appropriations of this year. It is justly to be deducted from them. Taking that out, and taking that view of it, the appropriation of this year exceeds the appropriation of last year by $785,959.15. But it is fair to the gentleman from New Jersey to say that he proposes in this bill several things to which I will refer after awhile that are not included in the bill of the current year—I mean the bill for the year ending 30th of June, 1882.

There are several important reforms in this bill. Among them, Mr. Chairman, is the proposition to prohibit the appointment of persons from civil life to positions in the Navy except as to surgeons and chaplains. I shall not attempt to explain it, but merely call the attention of the House to it, for that is sufficient.

Another reform is in the organization of the Medical Corps, the active list of the Pay Corps, the active list of the Engineer Corps, and the appointment of the Marine Corps from the Navy; in the Engineer Corps the bill provides for a reduction of one hundred and fifty-five officers; I believe that was not alluded to by the gentleman from New Jersey in his statement with regard to the bill this morning.

The reforms referred to, if carried out, would save to this Government in a very few years millions of dollars—there is no question about that; and I will be suffered to say right here that some of these reforms I have in a feeble way endeavored to bring about heretofore, for I have had charge of this bill for two years preceding this. But, sir, it was not possible, and it is not necessary for me to give the reasons, it was not possible for me to bring it about. I am happy to see them brought about in this bill, and I hope the House will adopt them. I am aware, sir, that there will be bitter war made upon some of these propositions, some of these reforms of which I have spoken, upon both sides of the House. I hope, sir, the House will look into them, and will act upon them dispassionately. If it shall adopt them it will save the Government in a very few years, as I have already remarked, millions of dollars.

But one of the most important reforms is the reduction of the civil establishment. As the gentleman from New Jersey told the House, the civil establishment has been top-heavy. That is one of the subjects to which I have addressed my attention heretofore, but on which I have not been able to accomplish a reform. In this bill we propose to cut down the civil establishment one-half. There are too many officers, there are too many employés in the navy-yards, and this bill proposes to reduce this establishment one-half, and it is believed that the service will be quite as efficient if this civil establishment is reduced and these employés are assigned to other duties or entirely discharged from the service. It is believed that the service will be quite as efficient or more so with the civil establishment reduced one-half than it is to-day. I have no doubt that proposition will meet bitter opposition on the floor. I will not elaborate that statement. It carries its own explanation on its face, and it is not necessary to elaborate it.

Another important reform proposed in this bill is the cutting off the appropriations that would be required to keep up on their present basis all the navy-yards that are now extant in the land. That is an important matter, and will address itself in my opinion to the sound sense and approval of this House and the country. There is no necessity for so many navy-yards; none at all. I am not here to discriminate, as it has not happened to be my province to do so. I am not here to say what navy-yards should be retained and what should be dispensed with. That is a subject which is submitted to the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy and to such boards of advisers as he may select. If I were to give a guess, and I desire always to be frank, I would say that the public service would require that the navy-yards at Brooklyn, at Norfolk, and upon our western coast, at Mare Island, should be kept up; and I do not believe there is any necessity for any other navy-yard in this country. But this bill does not propose to dismantle entirely the Washington navy-yard. It proposes to retain that for the purpose of manufacturing chains and some other things.

It does not propose to entirely dismantle the navy-yard at Boston, but to keep it for the purposes of a rope-walk, which is proper enough. But it does cut off appropriations to keep up all these navy-yards at their present standard; and if Congress shall pass this bill, it will become necessary for the Secretary of the Navy and the authorities of the country to dispense with them.

Now, I have no war to make on anybody's navy-yard, none at all. This bill is not conceived in any such spirit. The framers of this bill have no idea of striking at anybody, at any interest, at any section, at any city; none whatever. They have simply brought forward a recommendation upon this particular subject, in accordance with what the sub-committee and the whole Committee on Appropriations unanimously—however, I believe I am not quite correct in that—but a large majority of the committee, believe to be in accordance with the interest of the country.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I have spoken very briefly of matters in this bill that I approve of. It is due to frankness that I state to the House that there are some things in the bill in which I do not concur with the gentleman from New Jersey.

But there is one other which occurs to me, and which I will mention, in which I do concur. This bill appropriates $250,000 for the completion of the iron-clad Miantonomoh. She is now on the Delaware, finished, except that she requires her turrets to be placed upon her to contain the guns with which the vessel is to be armed. I have heretofore declined twice, in reporting the naval appropriation bill, to report any appropriation, and Congress has adopted the suggestion, for the completion of the Miantonomoh or any other of the iron-clads. I now believe it is for the public interest to finish the Miantonomoh. It only needs $250,000 to complete that vessel. When she gets her ordnance placed upon her and is ready for sea we will then know at once whether she is fit for service or whether she is unfit. There is a doubt in the public mind whether she is or not, but it will then be determined.

I believe that the best judgment of the naval authorities is that she will be fit for service when she is finished. At least it will only take an appropriation of $250,000 to put her turrets upon her, and therefore, so far as I am concerned, I am for that appropriation, and think that the vessel ought to be finished.

Mr. BERRY. How about the Monadnock?

Mr. ATKINS. In regard to the Monadnock, the Puritan, the Terror, and the Amphitrite, I am opposed to making the appropriation which this bill provides, of a sufficient sum of money to complete two of those vessels. Only two are proposed to be completed by this bill.

I am opposed to that simply because for two or three years I have had an impression fixed upon my mind that they could not be made seaworthy if they were finished. In that opinion I am sustained by some very high authorities. I will read from House Miscellaneous Documents, second session, Forty-fifth Congress, volume 7, page 365, from the report of the naval constructor of the United States, Captain John Lenthall, and the chief engineer of the United States Navy, B. F. Isherwood. In referring to the board of naval officers, of which Rear-Admiral Mullany was president, the report says:

> There only remains for us to say, in answer to the questions specifically asked by the honorable chairman of the Naval Committee of the House of Representatives, that our professional opinions and judgments are:
> First. Neither plans nor specifications were drawn for the construction of the new Puritan; nor were any measures adopted to ascertain whether, when built, she would sink or swim. The failure or success of a first-class national iron-clad was thus put to the hazard of mere chance.
> Second. This vessel, as far as constructed, and if finished as contemplated, is a total failure; nor can any changes now practicable make her efficient—meaning, by that term, equality with foreign iron-clads of the same size and type.

This report refers to the report of Rear-Admiral Mullany and to the report of Commodore Stephens—I believe that was his title—and speaks of those reports as both being adverse to the finishing of the Puritan and all these other vessels. Here is what Secretary Hunt said only last December:

> The monitors are at present simply bad copies of old models built in an emergency, worthless for the defense of our coasts and entailing a considerable expense for their preservation.

This is the statement of ex-Secretary Hunt, dated November 28, 1881.

Mr. McCOOK. Does he cite any naval authorities for that opinion?

Mr. ATKINS. I do not know that he does.

Mr. HOLMAN. That covers all times.

Mr. ATKINS. Of course it does; it covered all the past. It is not my purpose to discuss the bill or go into the merits of these vessels, for I am no naval man; I know very little about naval affairs. But it is sufficient for me, having had charge of this naval bill for two years, and now being on the sub-committee, backed by these authorities, not to undertake to make an appropriation for what is at least a doubtful experiment.

Speaking specifically with regard to the merits of these vessels, I did not feel that I was authorized to aid in making an appropriation of $1,000,000 to finish vessels which the very highest naval authority in the country has pronounced worthless. For this reason I might right here stop my remarks on that point.

I believe it is conceded that if we are to have a navy, it is hardly necessary that it be composed of great iron-clads. The United States does not look for her defense to ocean warfare. The United States is secure within her own borders; and if it would not seem an egotistical national boast, I would say that the United States does not fear the whole combined world if it wants to come to our shores and contest our sovereignty and our rights.

But it is not our policy, it never has been our policy, to make ourselves a first-class naval power. And so rapid are the improvements in naval warfare, so rapid are the improvements in projectile power and in the means of resistance, that, if we do design to have a navy it is perhaps well that we have not done much toward it up to this time, because the changes have been so rapid and so great that it is very likely if we had appropriated much money to adapt ourselves to these changes it would have been to a very great extent thrown away.

I believe it is conceded now that the inventions in projectile power have surpassed the inventions in the power of resistance. I believe it is conceded there is no iron-clad that it is possible to float which can resist the projectile power that has been invented within the last two or three years. Therefore it seems to me we could not rely upon iron-clads for our defense. I would rather have sand forts. It was proved at Fort Sumter that a sand fort is a better means of resistance than any iron-clad that can be constructed. There is no doubt about that, if we are to go into an investigation of subjects of this kind to determine our opinions as to the propriety of finishing these vessels. Having said that much, I have only to add that I am not in favor of the appropriation to finish these vessels.

Mr. BUCKNER. The gentleman will allow me to ask whether the finishing of the first-named vessel, which he is in favor of, will tend to demonstrate in any way whether the finishing of the other vessels, to which he is opposed, would be a proper subject of Congressional legislation?

Mr. ATKINS. I have thought of that, Mr. Chairman, but I am not sufficiently acquainted with the construction of the Miantonomoh and these other vessels to fairly answer that question. It might or it might not be so. I can say this, that at least the Puritan is not a sister ship of the Miantonomoh; whether the Monadnock is or is not I do not know, but I know that the Puritan is not. This I gleaned from my reading of the reports which have been made with regard to the completion of these vessels.

Mr. Chairman, it follows as a matter of course that I am opposed to this large increase for the Bureau of Steam Engineering—an increase of $1,113,000. I am opposed to that, because the purpose is to complete the machinery for two of these vessels. But it would do more, it would complete those vessels, and probably go very far toward the construction of one if not two new steel cruisers.

Whether or not it is the policy of Congress to inaugurate a new navy upon an appropriation bill is to be determined by the action of the House upon this bill. For my own part, I do not propose to take that business from the Committee on Naval Affairs. As a member of the Committee on Appropriations I do not propose to take from the Naval Committee the question whether we shall begin a navy or not. If a majority of the House and a majority of the Senate are in favor of building a navy or of beginning a new navy it should be done in the proper and usual way—upon a report from the Committee on Naval Affairs. I do not propose, so far as I am concerned, by any action that we may take upon this bill, to take that subject from the Naval Committee. I think it is a subject which Congress should discuss maturely and deliberately; and we should begin the work in earnest if we begin it at all. It should not be done piecemeal upon this bill. Therefore I am opposed to this large increase in the Bureau of Steam Engineering and in the Bureau of Construction and Repair, it being the purpose in these cases to begin to construct two new cruisers, as well as to finish two of these iron-clads.

Mr. McCOOK. Can you separate the items?

Mr. ATKINS. There is no difficulty about that; it is a matter of administration and is left entirely to the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. ROSECRANS. The appropriation covers four vessels.

Mr. ATKINS. It covers the construction of the machinery for two of the iron-clads, and also the construction of two new cruisers.

Mr. Chairman, I will reserve the residue of my time. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Thirty-five minutes.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Chairman, not very long since the Republican party on this floor regarded it as very vicious and dangerous to incorporate new or independent legislation into an appropriation bill. In this idea, according to my recollection, every Republican member of the present Committee on Appropriations concurred. And yet, Mr. Chairman, no appropriation bill ever submitted to this House contained more new and independent legislation than the present one. I need not define the proper office of a regular appropriation bill. It is in brief words the authority under legal grant then and thereby given to draw from the Treasury such moneys as are necessary to execute law already in existence. The pending bill proposes as changes in existing law—

First, to retire certain naval officers.

Second, to change materially the organization of the line and staff corps of the Navy.

Third, it proposes to change the management of the navy-yards by investing the Secretary of the Navy with the very dangerous power in his discretion of dismantling navy-yards. Shall that be Brooklyn, League Island, Boston, Pensacola, Norfolk, or New London? Shall it be done as it was done in the disgraceful manner that characterized the dismantling of the Philadelphia navy-yard under the discretion of a former Secretary of the Navy?

Fourth, the completion of the monitors.

Fifth, the sale of ships and materials.

Now, there are some features in these recommendations which, if in making provisions for their execution proper safeguards against abuses, extravagance, and corruption were made, it would be well enough to adopt as general laws. But, sir, I cannot resist the impression that their appearance in this bill was intended by the author of the bill to perform the office assigned to "the tub" when "thrown to the whale."

I beg leave to commend to the reflection of both sides of the House the dangers that ever attend that character of legislation known in parliamentary language as "riders."

Believing, Mr. Chairman, as I do that the hand and cunning of a master workman are displayed not only in the appropriation sought but as well in the time selected for the presentation and for the consideration of this bill, inasmuch as every step taken manifests consummate skill. The general body of this House, anxious to close its labors, will not tolerate lengthy discussions and expositions of the merits or demerits of the bill, but is ready to accept without inspection what is presented, and so whatever "design" the "master workman" may have had is accomplished.

Down beneath the specious displays of reform in this bill, Mr. Chairman, there lies the autocracy of the Secretary of the Navy, which unchecked will resurrect and revive the dangerous disregard and violations of law which characterized and disgraced the administration of the Navy Department from 1872 to 1877.

You are called upon to complete the monitors commenced by the administration referred to, and when that Secretary did commence them it was in utter disregard of law.

Now you are to complete them. Look at the bill. Are there any measures taken upon the face of the bill to protect the Government? And I respectfully appeal to the honored chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that when he looks at this bill and at the recommendation of the Stevens board, and looks at the official letter of May 20, 1880, of the late Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Thompson, made on the Preble board, he will see that it is officially reported that "if completed at all the plans and models of these vessels must be materially changed." Have you provided for it in this bill?

Have you taken a single step to protect and guard the interests of the Government? Not one. Yet it is to be hurried through here. And that is the part we are called on to perform.

Again, you are called upon to commence the building of two cruisers. How and by whom?

Again, let the honored chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, or any member of that committee, answer me, under this bill, whether it is to be done at the navy-yards or by contract? If so, and as stated in this bill to be in substantial accordance with the recommendations of the Committee on Naval Affairs, then I ask you if these recommendations are not doubled in that respect, some to be completed at the navy-yards and some by contract? How are these two to be done? Answer from this bill whether at the navy-yards or by contractors. Are there new jobs hidden here?

Again, will you remember, Mr. Chairman, that it is proposed by this bill that the dismantling of certain of the navy-yards shall be under the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy. Is the Secretary of the Navy to dismantle those that are able to roll iron plates where they have on hand the machinery? He dismantles them and compels the execution of these jobs by contractors. Is that to be done? Where, sir, have you protected the interests of the Government? Yet you ask this body to pass upon them.

The bill does not show it. You are called upon to invest the Secretary of the Navy with power to dismantle navy-yards. Which will he select? If we have a corrupt Secretary of the Navy, if that is possible in the history of this country (?) and we find, as we do, intimations from the public papers of the country that a job is concealed at Brooklyn, that another job at another navy-yard is contemplated, are we to invest that Secretary of the Navy with this dangerous power to confederate with those who would sell city lots? What vast powers of mischief and corruption are you not placing in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy, with no legal check or restraint whatever?

It behooves the committee, it behooves the House and the country to look at this bill as perpetuating the autocracy of the Secretary of the Navy.

You are called on to reorganize the personnel of the Navy. I speak of it as personnel—it is officers here.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire the attention of all right-thinking men of all parties on this floor. Read that bill for a moment and see again the dangerous power, the very great tyrannical power with which the Secretary of the Navy is invested. Commodores are to be retired and a board is to be organized so that if they choose, on the finding of that board that a captain or a junior commodore is promoted over the head of a senior commodore, that the senior commodore may be placed on the retired list as a rear-admiral. Sir, it is a power over the men who fought and won your battles during the civil war, and who have honored your flag at all times, that no man should be invested with.

You, sir, know, and I know, what it means when the Secretary of the Navy can appoint a board of this character. You and I know that it sometimes happens that they are kept on being appointed and reappointed until the purposes and objects of an unscrupulous or prejudiced secretary which may be hidden, are carried into operation; and I appeal to you that this large power will utterly demoralize the harmony and efficiency of the naval service, and the brain in which it was conceived must have had something else in it than the good of the service. At the bottom of the project it may be that personal motives are to be found.

Again, sir, in that connection I have said that the monitors are recommended to be completed. True, the explanation already tendered us by the members of the committee as to the completion of them is that only a little is to be expended; that it is a little thing under Construction and Repair, and a little thing under Engineering. Ay, Mr. Chairman, there is not a man on this floor that would vote one single dollar to these monitors but for the fact that the United States had already invested over three millions of dollars in them; and yet in the face of all of that you invite the committee and the Government to an expenditure of two millions of dollars, or something near that amount, toward the completion of these vessels. But I shall have something to say about these monitors further on in my remarks. I inquire only now who does not know that this appropriation granted means the entire completion of these vessels, inefficient ones as they are, as I shall attempt to show before this discussion closes.

In view, then, of this looseness in protecting the interests of the Government, which becomes apparent in the bill when we look at the other provisions of it, which are very exact in their estimates or statements as to what shall be expended on wooden ships, I feel warranted in saying that we are simply asked here to return to the days and to the manner of the management of the Navy previous to 1877 or between the years 1872 and 1877. You are invited, you are asked, ay, my friends on the Republican side, you are seduced into an indorsement of that administration, its modes, methods, and management, by the peculiar cunning and skill displayed in this bill; and it is to that administration I ask you now to give attention and say whether, when we are done with a review of it, you are prepared to indorse it.

THE FORMER NAVY—ITS ADMINISTRATION FROM 1870 TO 1877.

Mr. Chairman, the Navy of the United States in 1860 was constituted of about eighty-two vessels, and in 1860 it was the pride not only of the American nation but of all who admired naval architecture in the world. It was equal not in numbers but in every other respect equal to any navy on the face of the globe, and in some respects it was superior to all.

The war of 1861 intervened. During that war—and in order to be exact in what I state I beg leave to read to the committee what is said as to the numbers of the Navy by Mr. King, the chief engineer, in his work The War Ships and Navies of the World:

> During the civil war the United States built of armored vessels 63; of unarmored vessels, 102; with 12 tugs, transports, and torpedo boats the number of vessels was 177 built by the Government.
> In addition to the foregoing list of 177 vessels built during the four years of the war (a few only not completed) the Navy Department purchased 497 vessels from the mercantile marine, * * * and they added to the Navy the grand total of 674 vessels; * * * also, 80 not armed and equipped.

A large number of these vessels were lost during the war and a great many were sold immediately after its close; their names and number are accessible to any member who chooses to refer to Executive Document No. 280, second session of the Forty-fifth Congress; but waiving these details we come down to the year 1869, just prior to or just after the inauguration of the administration which was elected in November, 1868, and we find then the number of 203 vessels borne upon the United States Naval Register. Right here I desire the attention of my friend from New York [Mr. HEWITT] to this, because of a statement I saw in his hands a few days ago as to the number of vessels sold and the proceeds of materials sold. Prior to 1869, or it may be up to 1871, there was paid over into the Treasury of the United States from this source about the sum of $12,000,000. There was covered into the Treasury on account of old ships sold and material disposed of, from 1872 down to the present time, a little less than $1,000,000. Now, of the administration that in its time was denounced by the Republican party upon this floor for being corrupt and extravagant in its management of the Navy Department, to wit, that of Mr. Welles, it appears that the country received from ships and materials sold belonging to the Navy Department about $12,000,000, while from the same source during the year 1871 down to the present time there has been paid into the Treasury from the same source less than $1,000,000. Now, as I say, there were 203 vessels. There was sold during the administration of Mr. ROBESON, as I recollect—and I speak only from recollection, but on demand can give the exact numbers and names—there was sold or destroyed about sixty-one or sixty-two vessels; I will come after a while, Mr. Chairman, to a consideration of what became of these vessels, and why they were sold, &c. I come now back to the number of vessels on this register in 1869, and which have been placed there since. Assuming in 1869 two hundred and three vessels, this, with the building of eight sloops of war, authorized by Congress, and two torpedo-boats, and the purchase of four small vessels, makes a total of two hundred and seventeen to be accounted for. Now, take from that the number that has been lost, six; the number sold before July, 1871, twenty; sold after July, 1871, thirty-one; and the number broken up and destroyed after 1871, twenty, there remains upon the Register, as appears by the report of my friend from Massachusetts, one hundred and forty vessels of all sizes, characters, and descriptions.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask your attention to this further fact: after the disappearance of this number of vessels there were sold, exchanged, bartered, delivered away from the United States Government a large number of boilers, engines, stores, and materials, and I ask any gentleman who feels interested in this humiliating story as I am relating it to turn to volume 7, Miscellaneous Documents, third session of Forty-fifth Congress, pages 180 to 201, and on page 342 they will see the immense quantity of stores, materials, boilers, and engines, amounting in their cost to millions of dollars, which have been sold and bartered away from the United States. Where are they represented. It is not shown to be in the Treasury of the United States, where it ought to have been, where under the law, and if the administrators of the law had respected their oaths of office, it would have been to-day. It is not there. I will come to inquire in a few minutes where it did go to.

In addition to all that quantity of material and the number of ships on hand I call your attention to the official document which I hold in my hand, giving the appropriations made for the Bureau of Steam-Engineering, the Bureau of Construction and Repair, the Bureau of Equipments and Recruiting, and the Bureau of Ordnance. I am not dealing in any mysteries; I am down on hard-pan as to what does go into the construction and repair of your ships for efficient service.

Here is the official statement of the expenditures, beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and running down to 1878. It is as follows:

For the Bureaus of Construction and Repair, Steam-Engineering, Equipment and Recruiting, and Ordnance.

Fiscal year ending June 30—	Bureau of Steam-Engineering.	Bureau of Construction and Repair.	Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting.	Bureau of Ordnance.	Total.
1869	$2,004,495 76	$3,338,548 37	$1,588,901 74	$500,133 86	$7,432,079 73
1870	733,927 18	3,841,267 81	2,584,000 57	645,112 83	7,803,408 39
1871	157,369 19	4,231,370 69	1,467,455 80	508,255 50	6,364,451 18
1872	1,295,249 93	4,269,311 60	1,605,668 45	948,116 20	8,118,346 18
1873	1,682,099 00	4,545,957 54	1,837,268 43	1,153,515 59	9,218,840 56
1874	2,779,340 57	5,813,519 60	1,837,722 12	935,431 74	11,366,014 03
1875	1,812,046 25	4,334,257 81	1,175,547 61	509,392 53	7,831,244 20
1876	1,803,876 88	3,275,801 56	1,330,903 92	537,132 61	6,947,714 97
1877	942,499 66	1,949,063 45	781,721 49	333,678 70	4,006,963 30
1878	2,002,372 67	2,338,114 50	693,389 13	276,215 14	5,310,091 44
Total	15,212,377 09	37,937,212 93	14,962,579 26	6,346,984 70	74,399,153 98

It will be seen that the total amounts to $74,399,153.98.

Before noticing the answer by the Navy Department to the Hewitt resolution, to which I will refer in a few moments, I beg to say that if you will take the expenditures for these bureaus for the three years prior to July, 1869, and for the three years subsequent to 1878—and this will cover the period embraced in the answer to the Hewitt resolution—you will have the amount of money expended for all purposes by these bureaus in that time. In the absence of official data I assume an average of expenditures for these years, and take the three years prior to 1878; they present the lowest average of any three years in this list. That shows an average of $5,000,000 a year, or $30,000,000 for six years. This statement, which no one will controvert and which corresponds with the years furnished in answer to the Hewitt resolution, shows that during this period of time there was expended over $100,000,000 in these bureaus alone.

Now, then, gentlemen, the inquiry comes up, what has become of the ships? What has become of these boilers and engines and all this material? What has become of this vast sum appropriated for the construction and repair of the Navy? Where is it to-day? Who has got it? I propose, Mr. Chairman, to go along logically if I can, and by the record, and show at least where it ought to have gone to, and to show it has not gone there.

The Hewitt resolution called for a statement of expenditures and for specific information by the years, and by what bureaus. The answer came to that resolution, and from the answer to that resolution—and I beg the attention of the committee—it appears that the expenditures as shown by that document (Executive Document No. 30) by periods of years were as follows:

1877–1881	8,466,833 21

Making the expenditures according to that official statement, for the construction and repair of the Navy, $42,130,696.63 since 1865.

I have here, but will not read it, the approximate estimate of these expenditures by bureaus. But waiving that for the moment, I have now to call the attention of the committee to this state of facts, not shown in the answer to Mr. HEWITT's resolution. I proceed to read to the committee a list of vessels and amounts that are not shown in that answer that ought to have been shown; and before I am through with this I shall ask the attention of the committee to the methods by which this answer to Mr. HEWITT's resolution was prepared, as I have learned of them.

On the Galena, under Porter, there was an expenditure of $5,226.70; under Hanscom, $268,623.18.

On the Miantonomoh, under Porter, there were two amounts, one of $36,965.70 and one of $57,813.42; and under Hanscom $259,000. And when I say Hanscom, the committee will understand me as meaning the Secretary of the Navy that hailed from the State of New Jersey.

On the Terror, under Porter, $48,222.34, and another sum of $29,748.09; under Hanscom, $159,800.

On the Monadnock, under Porter, $16,586.07; under Hanscom, $194,869.05.

On the Yantic, under Porter, $11,941.06; under Hanscom, $171,830.05.

On the Tallapoosa, under Porter, $17,364.56; under Hanscom, $6,112.03, and another sum of $200,692.

On the Nipsic, under Porter, $51,073; under Hanscom, $152,929.

On the Quinnebang, under Hanscom, $305,407.59.

On the Marion, under Hanscom, $427,493.56.

On the Vandalia, under Hanscom, $589,948.43.

On the Amphitrite, under Hanscom, $97,200.

On the Puritan, under Hanscom, $227,500.

Making, as I foot it up, the sum of $3,336,346.83 not included in the repairs, &c., upon the vessels named in the answer made to Mr. HEWITT's resolution.

Now, gentlemen, why this concealment? And this is not all of it. I dare assert upon this floor that when the exact truth is known there will be found to be $3,000,000 more hid away in these figures, so as not to be read as you run, not to be seen by the inexpert mind, or upon the face of this document when you come to look over these figures.

I turn you for proof of what I say to an answer made by Isaiah Hanscom under oath in the year 1876, when called by the Naval Committee of the House to answer and to render a—

Statement of vessels repaired under the cognizance of the Bureau of Construction and Repair of the Navy Department since March 1, 1869, where the repairs have exceeded in cost $3,000—

Taken, says this answer, from the bureau records.

Now, gentlemen, I have here, and I will give you the name of the document, volume two, of the investigations of the Navy Department, first session, Forty-fourth Congress. See page 536 et seq. of appendix. Turn there and read the answers, and the vessels I have named and some that I have yet to name. You will see that in pretending to answer the resolution of Mr. HEWITT they did not give the required and correct answer, if this former answer be the truth.

Now, I ask you, can you believe either one of these parties? Who was it that prepared the answer to this Hewitt resolution? I am standing here in the presence of men who know the facts, and if I misstate them I desire them to correct me. I say that I am informed that the man who prepared this answer, or was engaged about its preparation for the Construction Bureau, is B. F. Hanley. Dare any man say he is not the man who did the work? Who is B. F. Hanley? Go ask the late Secretary of the Navy, Richard W. Thompson, and ask him for what he discharged B. F. Hanley from the Navy Department, and then ask, in view of the fact that he was discharged for cause, as alleged, how it happens that he is back here making up an answer to a resolution of this House?

I do not wish to-day to speak from anything than from the record. I will read from the record. Rudolph Knapp was recalled and further examined before the Committee on Naval Affairs, June 6, 1878:

Question. When you were last before the committee you were asked in regard to the preparation of fictitious statements, and in your reply thereto you stated, as I remember, that you had made out an estimate of the cost of building the eight sloops of war, which was subsequently changed. Is this paper now shown to you [handing a paper to witness] a statement made out by yourself, and which you then regarded as the true cost of these vessels, according to the books of the bureau?

Answer. Yes, sir, [identifying the following statement, dated January 8, 1876, of the cost of building eight steam sloops of war, under the cognizance of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, Navy Department:]

* * * * * * * *

Q. The paper which you produce here next is the paper as you were directed to make it out afterward?

A. Yes, sir; this is the paper.

I have here before me the true paper, the paper as the records of the Department show it. I have also before me the paper that he was directed to make out. The records of the Navy Department show an expenditure of $3,687,518.60 on eight sloops of war. The law authorized the Secretary of the Navy to expend only $3,200,000. When Congress was calling for the correct information, and the books showed that appropriation had been exceeded, it was necessary to doctor the statement so as to bring it within the terms of the law. That was done and that second statement was prepared. I refer to volume 7, House Miscellaneous Document, second session, Forty-fifth Congress, pages 411 to 414, for what I quote from this witness.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Which is correct?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I should say the books of the Department were correct.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Not necessarily.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Again the witness was asked:

Question. By whom were you directed, and who made the changes or alterations?

Answer. They were made by Mr. Hanscom.

Q. Do you know whether that was done with the knowledge of the Secretary of the Navy?

A. Yes, sir; it was done with his knowledge. He (Hanscom) went up stairs to see him.

Q. You were asked in relation to making out a statement of the expenditures of the Bureau of Construction and Repair on account of the removal of the navy-yard from Philadelphia to League Island?

A. Yes, sir; I was told to put those accounts in.

I have here the statement from the books of the Department as sworn to by that witness, which shows the legitimate expenditure of $137,938 as the correct amount chargeable to the fund for the removing property from the Philadelphia navy-yard to League Island. This House was investigating the expenditure of public money, and in making out the statement Mr. Knapp, again under the direction of the bureau, brings it in as $543,985.45. And in another portion of my remarks I will probably have occasion to read what those expenditures were for.

I am sorry that just at this moment the author of this bill has disappeared from his seat. I will ask some friend of his to take a note of the page I refer to, and what was said. I went on to ask the witness:

Question. Do you know of the preparation and changing of any other papers?

Answer. Yes, sir; I know about some of them.

Q. What were they?

A. Well, there was one statement asked for, giving the amount expended in repairing ships exceeding $3,000, or something of that kind. I know that I made out a statement which was afterward changed.

Q. You made out your first statement according as the books or records were?

A. Yes, sir; and then Mr. ROBESON said I had amounts in that did not belong to it; that I did not understand the question; and he took the statement away and gave it to Mr. Hanley. Mr. ROBESON said: "You give it to Mr. Hanley and let him make it out;" and Mr. Hanley took it away. I think the statement was in answer to a question from your committee.

Now, I show a want of harmony and an inconsistency between the several documents submitted to this House. I show by whom these things were made. I show that the witness swears that he was engaged in the work of making out false and fictitious statements. I show that it was done with the knowledge of the then Secretary of the Navy. And I stand here to-day and say, and say it boldly, upon information, that one of the clerks employed in this work was dismissed by Mr. Thompson, and is found back at the Navy Department engaged in the work of preparing this answer with the knowledge of the man who has reported this bill.

Now, in answer to the Hewitt resolution, because we are upon the line of expenditures in the Navy Department, I have shown you that $42,000,000 were said to have been expended. I have shown you also that over $3,000,000 more ought to have been included in the statement. That appears from the statement made in 1876 by Mr. Hanscom.

I now come to another item. I am now after the expenditures in the Navy Department, to which should be added repairs on vessels whose names are not reported in answer to said resolution, thirty-two in number, as shown by the investigation of the Forty-fourth Congress and the report of the minority on naval investigation to the Forty-fifth Congress, amounting to $1,630,787.57.

Now, Mr. Chairman, add all these together, and there were expended $47,097,830.93. Add the amount that should be charged, which appears in the official documents to which I have referred, and it will show that over $50,000,000 have been expended since the year 1865 in the construction and repair of the Navy. I was not here a few days since when I understand it was boasted upon this floor that the United States Navy is equal, vessel for vessel of class and kind, to any navy in the world; and that this is the work of the Secretary of the Navy who occupied that place from 1870 to 1877. I propose, Mr. Chairman, to ask the attention of the committee to the expenditures made upon the different classes of vessels—the expenditures on the thirty-eight cruisers mentioned in the Harris report, which constitute the serviceable vessels in the United States Navy at this time—and an analysis of these expenditures shows that the boast is not warranted.

There was expended from 1865 to 1869 $3,369,362.77. From 1869 to 1877 there was expended $15,692,481.54. From 1877 to 1881 there was expended $7,127,559.50. In other words, according to the report made in response to the Hewitt resolution, there was expended upon these cruisers by way of repairs $26,189,403.81. (See appendix No. 1.)

I now turn to the second list, embracing the expenditures on iron-clads, excluding the five monitors. From 1865 to 1869 there was expended $105,364.65; from 1869 to 1877, $3,965,776.49; from 1877 to 1881, $165,768.94; making $4,236,910.08 expended upon these iron-clads. (See appendix No. 2.)

There was expended upon the vessels which I have included in the first list, which I will publish in my speech (see appendix No. 3)—worthless vessels, according to the Harris report—$1,630,787.57. On tugs there was expended $1,104,000. On the Dictator and Roanoke—worthless, according to the Harris report—there was expended $434,684; and on the Antietam and others—worthless vessels, according to the Harris report—there was expended, from 1865 to 1869, $1,000,942.33.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. During what periods are the expenditures to which the gentleman is referring?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I am stating the years. I continue the statement. From 1869 to 1877 the amount expended was $3,531,201.74; from 1877 to 1881, $719,038.18; making the expenditure upon vessels of this class $5,251,185.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Is there anything in what the gentleman calls the "Harris report" which shows that the vessels at the time of the expenditure were worthless?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I will publish my friend's report with my remarks. (See appendix No. 5.)

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman whether there is anything in the report which shows that the vessels were worthless at the time the moneys were expended upon them? I think that is a fair question and should be answered.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I will answer the gentleman in the course of my remarks. I will do the gentleman no injustice. He will see that I have classified these different vessels. Upon vessels of doubtful value (see Harris report) there was expended from 1865 to 1869 $865,906.49; from 1869 to 1877, $3,750,137.10; from 1877 to 1881, $235,131.37, making in round numbers $4,851,000. (See appendix No. 6.)

Upon the eight steam vessels (see Harris's report) there was expended from 1865 to 1869 $58,606.92; from 1869 to 1877, $4,297.89; from 1877 to 1881, $126.12, making $63,030.90. (See appendix No. 7.)

Recapitulating, the amount expended in repairs is $47,097,830.93.

I have gone through the expenditures by years. I propose now to go through them by administrations. There was expended by the Robeson administration, as near as it can be calculated from the answers made to the Hewitt resolution, as follows:

Mr. Robeson expended on—
Cruisers*	$15,692,481 54

And for a sum not given but warranted, and which upon an issue being made I will undertake to show was further expended by that administration, $3,000,000. Thus you have expended by the Robeson administration, from 1869 to its close, about $35,000,000 in the line of construction and repair. It is for this sum, as members of the committee will remember, that that Representative claimed to have made "a navy." I shall in a few moments call attention to that claim and make a comparison of the cost of the vessels. I have here, Mr. Chairman, a statement showing in the same manner the expenditures by the Welles administration and the Thompson administration. I incorporate those statements in my remarks. (See appendix:)

Mr. Welles expended on—

The inquiry made by my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS] is a proper and pertinent one. Why, sir, it would appear that the administration of Mr. ROBESON expended upon worthless vessels, or such as I have characterized and are now characterized as worthless, nearly or quite $12,000,000. In my judgment it ought not to have been done. But it is due to a candid statement of the facts that I should say that ten years ago the vessels then being repaired were not probably in such condition as they were at the time when my friend from Massachusetts made his report. There are circumstances which have intervened between that time and the present which might have excused or justified some of the repairs which were made. Is not this a just and fair statement? It is responsive, I take it, with all that my friend has asked me to state, and it is the statement which I intended to make; because I come now, Mr. Chairman, to make a comparison of the cost of the Navy.

Here you have, as I have said, $35,000,000 in money expended by ROBESON. Do my friends on this floor know what that means—$35,000,000! I can, if you please, show what it means in a naval point of view. I quote from King's War-Ships and Navies of the World, page 379:

> The total number of vessels of all classes built by and for the Navy Department from April 1, 1861, to April 1, 1865, was as follows:
> Armored vessels: Two broadside sea-going ships; two first-class iron single-turret vessels; nine wood and iron double-turret vessels; forty-five single-turret iron river monitors; five river casemate vessels—making a total of sixty-three armored vessels, having an aggregate of 62,367 tons, carrying one hundred and eighty-five guns, and costing in the aggregate $35,848,212.

Here, sir, the United States, amid all the clamor of war and the prevailing high prices, built this armored fleet, more in number, nearly twice in number of that presented to the admiration of his countrymen by the late Secretary of the Navy, and built for an equal sum of money.

Take again from this same book what is said in reference to unarmored vessels:

> Unarmored vessels: Six first-class screw corvettes; fourteen second-class screw corvettes; twelve third-class screw corvettes; twenty-three screw gun-boats; twenty-seven wooden paddle-wheel double-enders; eight iron double-enders; twelve other paddle-wheel steamers; making a total of 102 unarmored vessels, having an aggregate of 99,842 tons, carrying 899 guns, and costing in the aggregate $27,061,374.

Seven or eight million dollars less than the sum of money expended by the late Secretary of the Navy in the repair and reconstruction of our modern United States Navy. Is this a matter to be boasted of?

But I am not done, Mr. Chairman, with that——

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a single question?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Does not the gentleman think it would have been better for Congress ten years or twenty years ago to have authorized some Secretary of the Navy to commence the construction of new vessels rather than to waste money in the repair of old ones?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I think it would.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Would it not be, in his judgment, economy for us now to begin that work? I ask these questions because I understand the gentleman from Tennessee to have opposed the construction of a single new ship.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. The gentleman has been misinformed. If they will put an honest man at the head of the Navy Department—if they will put at the head of the Navy Department my friend from Massachusetts, I will vote for almost anything in the shape of a Navy which he will recommend.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I am obliged to the gentleman for his compliment.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. But they do not put such men as you are there; depend on that.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. That is a pleasant compliment, but it does not answer my question.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I did answer your question when I said you were misinformed. I will come to that after a while.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in order to show this committee, and that the people of the United States may see how their money goes, and to make a comparison, I will make this statement: thirty-eight vessels are called cruisers in the Navy of the United States. Here I have a calculation taken from the estimate made by the advisory board as to the cost of thirty-eight vessels as recommended by them, eighteen of them being steel, and it foots up $26,110,000. Here it is shown by experts, by the men in whom you are bound to have confidence, who come and tell you they can build for you three steel vessels, fifteen knots, and there are none of that kind in the United States Navy; five of fourteen knots an hour, and there are none of that kind in the United States Navy; ten of thirteen knots, and there are none of that kind in the United States Navy, (only one which claims to go above that, and that only semi-occasionally;) ten of thirteen knots an hour, all being of steel, and twenty of the ten-knot class as recommended by that advisory committee, and it foots up, as I have said, a cost of $25,110,000. If I show you that a new navy, built of different material, more costly material, and a great deal better vessels in every respect can be built for nine millions of money cheaper, less than the sum expended by that Secretary of the Navy, are not you prepared to answer me that there has been that amount of money squandered somewhere along the line?

Once more, gentlemen, I ask your attention. Turn to the estimates of iron vessels made by the constructors and engineers of the Navy, and you will find that they will build the same number of vessels which are now borne on your cruiser list for $21,000,000 and give three of them fifteen knots an hour, five fourteen knots an hour, and ten thirteen knots an hour, and twenty of ten knots, and that shows to you, though most of your vessels borne on the cruiser list are wooden vessels and they had the benefit of the foundation to build upon, it shows to you that that Secretary of the Navy has deliberately squandered between fifteen and twenty million dollars in this work of reconstruction and repair, and yet he boasts that he has built our modern Navy.

But do you want more proof of it? I will give it to you.

Take, if you please, and turn now to the report of the advisory board, and you will remember that it was recommended by that board for the construction of two first-rates, ten second-rates, twenty fourth-rates, five steam rams, ten torpedo gunboats, and other vessels, making a total of sixty-eight, the entire estimated cost of which was $29,607,000. An entire new and efficient Navy, with thirty more vessels. Here, then, with this expenditure to build up and complete the Navy, you find that the Secretary of the Navy exceeded it during his administration by about $6,000,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I might pause here, these comparisons show sufficiently and satisfactorily the waste of public money. I do so, only asking the attention of the committee to the testimony of Commander Mead with reference to the cost of construction of naval vessels when examined before the Naval Committee as to the cost of the navies of the world, all of which would go to sustain the proposition I have made; but I proceed to other matters, asking you to reflect upon this comparison of the expenditures made for the repair and construction of our modern Navy. We have, as I have shown, $104,000,000 in money expended by the Bureaus of Ordnance, Equipment and Recruiting, Construction and Repairs, and Steam-Engineering, out of which I have shown that, as given in answer to the Hewitt resolution and other official sources, about $50,000,000 in the way of construction and repair was expended, and that out of this sum I believe at least $15,000,000 was lavishly and foolishly expended by the Robeson administration. Then there is about $54,000,000 to be accounted for. At least forty millions of this was expended between the years 1870 and 1877. Where did it go? What became of it? I submit to you, and many of you are business men, that the Secretary of the Navy should show that that $54,000,000 is represented somewhere, in some material, or in some other manner. Ought it not to be shown? As a business proposition is it not so? In what timber, iron, articles, or stores of any description is this money accounted for?

WHERE ARE THE NAVAL STORES?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I stand here upon my responsibility as your corepresentative, I stand here on my responsibility as a man to assert, and dare and defy that administration to show an increase in the volume of stores. I am not talking again without the books. I beg to call your attention to the official proof in that connection. I ask the committee now to turn to page 169 of this volume 7, of the miscellaneous documents of the second session of the Forty-fifth Congress, and examine the answers made to a question with reference to the amount of stores belonging to the Bureau of Steam-Engineering. It is here stated that the amount of stores on hand at the several navy-yards and stations in January, 1871, was $2,421,396.37. On January 6, 1878, it was $2,260,649, showing a decrease, notwithstanding the large appropriations made to it.

I call attention particularly to this report or return from the Bureau of Steam-Engineering, to show that those stores have been decreasing. I ask the attention of the committee also to page 334 of the same volume, which shows the total amount of stores on hand in the Bureau of Construction and Repair on January 1, 1871, was $6,247,205.71, while on January 1, 1878, it was but $6,007,768.30. So that the committee will see that in the principal bureaus there are not on hand the stores that should be on hand to represent this $54,000,000. What has become of this vast sum of money? Where has it gone? It does not represent labor in construction and repair, for that is shown in the cost of repairs on reports already given. It cannot be that it is for support of navy-yards for that comes from a different appropriation.

Adopting the suggestion of my friend from Massachusetts, I beg leave simply and without comment at present to call the attention of the committee to the mode and manner under which and in which in my judgment this vast sum of money has disappeared. I will refer to these bureaus, the Bureau of Construction, Bureau of Steam-Engineering, and Provisions and Clothing, and I will elaborate and print details if no one objects.*

BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIRS.

In the Bureau of Construction the first thing to note is the sale of vessels; the next is the exchange of vessels; the next is the destruction of vessels and the exchange of material. The cost of vessels and materials so sold, bartered, and exchanged is to be seen on pages 300 to 332 of the volume to which I have already referred—and it amounts to millions of dollars.

*For personal reasons I will not here avail myself of this privilege. I will simply call over the points as a lawyer would do the heads of his argument.

Mr. Chairman, what law is there to authorize any Secretary of the Navy to destroy a vessel borne upon the Register of the Navy? What authority did the late Secretary of the Navy possess to destroy any single vessel? Again, what authority did he have for exchanging? And in this connection I ask leave to read to the committee and to commend to their consideration the opinion of Attorney-General Taney upon a barter-and-exchange transaction. On the 11th of September, 1833, upon a question "arising on an agreement made by Lieutenant Symington, and afterward sanctioned by the head of the Ordnance (War Department) Office, with Harrison Gassaway for a quantity of gun-skidding, to be paid for in old castings at $20 per ton," and of which he says, among other things relating to the facts: "It is sufficient to say that the contract to pay in old iron was executed by breaking up and delivering sundry cannon reported to be unfit for service," &c., upon which he gives the following opinion:

The transaction was, in its nature, a barter of the guns for the skidding. There is no power under any law of Congress to make contracts of barter; but all articles directed to be purchased are intended to be paid for in money; and if the contract can be legally justified it must be on the ground that it was a sale of the iron to Mr. Gassaway at the price specified in the contract; and in order to support it as a sale it must appear that the head of the Ordnance Department had lawful authority to break up and sell any cannon which he supposed to be unfit for service and sell at private sale for such iron as he thought it was worth.

This opinion is conclusive against the alleged right and custom to barter; and yet, sir, an ex-Secretary of the Navy bartered and exchanged twenty vessels, destroyed them, bartered and exchanged their material; and these vessels, according to my recollection, cost over $12,000,000. Again, he sold others costing a large sum of money to the contractors in payment for the work done and to be done for the Navy Department. I shall call attention in my printed remarks to the character and to the amount of these losses, representing property that cost, as I have said, the Government millions of dollars.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I state to you that there were between forty and fifty millions of pounds of old iron, so called, delivered by the Navy Department, from one bureau alone, to John Roach; that this quantity of iron went into his hands to enter into the construction of these so-called double-turreted monitors. I say to you that by the record it can be demonstrated that the Navy Department performed the office of a deposit bank for the benefit of John Roach.

Again, I would show that Mr. Robert, an iron manufacturer of Philadelphia, says that in some of these barter transactions and exchange business there was a profit of between $30 and $40 per ton, and this is manifest by other proof. All this was contrary to law, and in a number of instances especially so, because it was an advance payment. I would show that these contracts were made with the knowledge and consent of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. Chairman, I would further, if I had time, show to the committee that Swift, a timber-dealer, paid Southard to get out of his way as contractor, $10,000; that he paid to S. P. Brown to get out of his way, $4,500; that he paid to Cattell $37,500 for his influence merely with the Navy Department. I would show that Bigler paid to Cattell a large amount; that Brown got $5.03 a ton for coal from the Bureau of Engineering, when, from the same yard, and at the same time, the Bureau of Equipment got its coal, the same kind, at $4.37 a ton; I would show that Brown was paid on a large amount of timber $10 to $15 per thousand feet more than the market price; and, in another instance, he was paid $90 per thousand feet on a lot of 600,000 feet of lumber delivered at the Washington navy-yard, the market or schedule price being $55 per thousand feet. I would show another transaction by which there was filched directly from the United States for a lot of iron bought in the city of New York and shipped to Mare Island, and which lies there now unused, the sum of $12,114, the United States being swindled out of that amount in that one transaction.

I would show again: Trickey sold to the Government pine lumber at $45 per thousand feet, when he bought it from Fogg, and Fogg delivered it at the Boston navy-yard, getting $32 for it. I would show that Hatch, Loud & Co. were paid $62 for live-oak delivered at the Philadelphia navy-yard; the same timber that Mann & Co. had made a contract to deliver at $40. Hatch, Loud & Co. bought them off and sold the same at $62 a thousand feet. I would call attention to the purchase of the Burlington and the dry-dock, the circumstances of which are familiar to the late Secretary of the Navy. I would call attention to the disgraceful transactions attending the sale of the Philadelphia navy-yard, and the removal of the property therefrom to League Island.

I would call attention to the fact that when the Government of the United States, or Congress, authorized $5,000 a year to be paid to timber agents in Florida, the late Secretary of the Navy, or his heads of bureaus, appointed a man who remained in the State of New Jersey, sitting in his law office and drawing salaries for work said to have been performed in the State of Florida; and the appointment of preachers and politicians as timber agents who never were within hundreds of miles of the Florida navy-timber lands, and who drew salaries out of this appropriation.

I might go on and multiply instances of this kind. But, as a remarkable transaction, I desire the Clerk to read what I send up, because it is about a navy with which the chairman of this Committee of the Whole [Mr. PAGE] is familiar. I ask it to be read as showing among other things the way and manner in which things were done under the administration to which I refer.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Private.]

UNITED STATES NAVY PAY OFFICE,
San Francisco, February 24, 1875.

DEAR SIR: Pay Inspector R. C. Spaulding will forward by this mail an explanation requested in your letter to me.

If investigations are the order of the day, and while we are not disposed to shrink from the most searching scrutiny concerning the manner in which business has been done in this office, (provided such examination is carried on in a spirit of fairness,) yet for your own information and for the purpose of showing where the responsibility rests of paying more than the "market rates," I submit the following facts:

In 1873 shipment of "white-oak plank," "beam fillings," "white-oak timber," by J. Bigler & Co., (Eastern contractors,) was made to navy-yard, Mare Island, at the instance of the Department, and $72,794.75 was paid for the same. The material so delivered was valueless.

In 1872 the ship Fleetwood, from Brooklyn navy-yard, delivered at Mare Island oak timber and white-oak plank amounting to $21,073.15, all of which material was condemned by the inspector at Mare Island navy-yard. (The above material was for the bureau of "C. and R.")

In 1873 a cargo of coal was offered to the Government by a prominent dealer in this city for the Bureau of "E. and R.," at $17.50 (currency) per ton. The offer was declined, and the same cargo immediately purchased of one S. P. Brown, another Eastern contractor, by Bureau of "Steam Engineer," for $23 per ton, (currency,) by authority of the Secretary of the Navy.

The same year 300 tons of pig-iron was purchased in the East by one Babcock, on requisition from Mare Island, for $73 per ton. Bids for the same by a San Francisco dealer were put down at $63 per ton. The responsibility of this transaction rests with Engineers Wood and Lawton, of Bureau of "Steam Engineering."

Another case—Babcock & Co., Eastern dealers, furnished rubber hose for Bureau of "Y. and D.," charging and receiving $6,000 more than was bid by San Francisco dealers for the same material. Chief Clerk Merritt, of the Bureau of "Y. and D.," Washington, is most likely responsible for this purchase, or for putting up the job.

Another case, not quite so bad—an engine for a new tugboat at our navy-yard, was built in the East, without receiving bids at all in California. Engineers Wood and Lawton are chargeable with this neglect of the home manufacturers.

Chief Engineer Wood, of the Bureau of "Steam Engineering," in connection with Lawton of this yard, are responsible for the purchase in the East of $10,000 worth of second-rate quality of tools, consisting of lathes, planes, drills, &c., when a first quality of similar tools was offered in San Francisco for the same price.

There are many other irregularities which an expert, with authority to investigate affairs at our navy-yard, could not fail to meet with if earnest in the pursuit of facts, and which I do not now consider necessary to intrude upon your attention.

* * * * * * *

I remain, very truly, yours,

GEORGE M. PINNEY.

Hon. A. A. SARGENT, Washington, D. C.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I would refer also to the great loss in the purchase of "promiscuous timber," and would challenge the fact alleged as to the quantity on hand, and venture to say that whenever a true account is taken, a large deficiency will be shown in value as well as quantity of timber and lumber.

BUREAU OF STEAM-ENGINEERING.

I now pass on from the Bureau of Construction and Repair and call attention to the mode and manner in which things were disposed of in the Bureau of Steam-Engineering. I refer to the deposition of Mr. Schock, to the deposition of Mr. King, and to the reports made by Mr. King to the late Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Thompson. I refer also to the testimony of the late Chief Engineer Sprague, by which I would show that the United States lost in a reckless disregard of the law, in that autocratic spirit which governed and controlled the Navy Department, and which acknowledged no dominion or control from any source except its own will—I would show by the testimony referred to, and which I have here, that the Government of the United States lost hundreds of thousands of dollars in the sale of boilers, engines, copper, iron, &c., much of it new and available for use. I would show thousands lost in prices paid for boilers and engines. I refer to volume 7, Miscellaneous Documents, second session, Forty-fifth Congress.

BUREAU OF PROVISIONS AND CLOTHING.

But I pass from that bureau to the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing. I ask the attention of the committee to the testimony of Mr. Cutter, late Paymaster General, who says, on page 567 of the same document, in answer to an inquiry in regard to the price of clothing:

Question. Were those prices high?

Answer. Yes, sir; I think both were high, except some blue cloth, which I think cost $4 a yard; that is a very fair valuation for it; it is double width. Other things are very high—the flannel and satinet.

Q. As a matter of fact it is nothing to the Government, if to the sailor, what price may be paid by you for the sailor, for under the law he pays it back again?

A. No, sir.

Q. And really, if there is any imposition by high prices, it is imposed on the sailor; that is where it reaches?

A. That is where it reaches, and that is the end of it.

Now, that administration, not content with robbing the people of the United States, not content with plundering them, sought out poor helpless Jack and robbed him. I would call your attention here to the large quantity of supplies bought by that bureau. An examination was made, directly after the close of the administration referred to, to see the surplus of stock on hand. There was found on hand tea enough for thirty years; evaporated potato enough for twenty years; onions for four years; pea-jackets and monkey-jackets for thirty years; blue cloth trousers for six years; satinet trousers for four years; Barnsly sheeting frocks for eighteen years; blue satinet for nine years; beeswax for thirty years; thread for twenty years, and ribbon for twelve years, and so with a great many other articles. That is the way the money goes which does not belong to them, when some one else has to pay for the music. Be it said to the credit of Mr. Thompson's administration that the prices were reduced for the benefit of the sailor.

Now turn to the disposition of property which was made by private and confidential transactions between the head of the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing and one William Matthews of the State of New York. Trace the history of William Matthews and his connection with that administration. Trace the avenues by which he reached all the heads of bureaus and the head of the Department. Trace back the connection, and you will see that in that bureau alone the Government of the United States from first to last must have been swindled in its connections with Matthews and McKnight out of more than a million of dollars.

It is by such means and methods that the large sums which have been appropriated for the support of the Navy were made to disappear. Not one of the provisions made by the law for the security of the public money and property was observed.

The law requiring advertisement, the law requiring written contracts, the law requiring bond and sureties, the law requiring public sales, the law requiring reports to be made to Congress were constantly ignored and disregarded. The law prohibiting expenditures in excess of appropriations, the law prohibiting transfer of appropriations were disobeyed. I pause here as to those methods.

DOUBLE-TURRETED MONITORS.

I have hurried through with the purpose of coming to the monitors, for I have a word or two to say about them. I am sorry my time is limited, that my lungs are so weak, and the weather so oppressive that I cannot continue much longer. But I ask the attention of the committee to the monitors, how conceived and how brought forth—conceived, mark what I say, in open, palpable, direct contempt and violation of the law; and the man or men who made the original contract or agreement for the rebuilding of these monitors did it in contempt of the law.

Now, I ask your attention right here to this statement, and I wish my friend from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] was here to follow the transaction step by step. In the fall of 1873, Mr. Chairman, you will remember the Virginius excitement; you will remember that under it the then Secretary of the Navy made large expenditures of money. And you will remember that he came to the Congress of the United States at the commencement of its session in 1873, and asked for an appropriation of $4,000,000 to reimburse him for his expenditures. I have here his letter asking for that appropriation. I have here the debate that occurred upon it, and I will read you the closing sentence of the communication of the then Secretary of the Navy, addressed to both Houses, asking for this appropriation of $4,000,000. Read it, honest, earnest, and thoughtful Republicans:

If—

Says the Secretary—

If our force is to be increased or if the powerful double-turreted monitors Miantonomoh, Monadnock, and Puritan are to be put into a condition of usefulness, at least $1,000,000 more will be required.

There is no doubt that the Secretary wanted that money, is there? He came before the committees of both Houses and they declined to grant the appropriation. The late Senator from the State of California, [Mr. Sargent,] in the discussion upon the subject in the Senate, after the rejection of this request of the Secretary, said:

Mr. President, my objection to this bill is that it appropriates $1,000,000 too little. The Secretary of the Navy, in the letter which has been read at the desk, after stating that the $4,000,000 provided for in this bill are necessary in order to complete the fitting out of the vessels which are now in hand, says that if the Navy is to be strengthened $1,000,000 more ought to be appropriated for this purpose. He has reference to the double-turreted monitors carrying four 15-inch guns each, now dismantled and useless.

Mr. Sargent, then Senator from California, regretted that Congress would not give to the Secretary of the Navy $1,000,000 more; yet if he had known how artful, how ingenious, how respectful to the law was that Secretary, he would not have had any occasion for regret, for he would have found that the Secretary of the Navy in less than nine months thereafter, under a provision of law authorizing an appropriation taken from the Pensacola floating dock to be made available for the purpose of completing the repairs on the double-turreted monitors, was able to dispense with the authority which he had asked from Congress. Congress refuses, but the Secretary wills. He came before Congress with what appears to be a deliberate fraud in asking the diversion of that appropriation for the benefit of the Pensacola dock. You will see by reference to the act of June, 1874, that the Secretary is allowed to use the balance of this fund for the purpose of completing the repairs on these monitors. Were there any repairs then going on or contracted for? I answer no, by the record. Was not Congress then deceived? But a contract is made for the purpose of building these monitors. And never—mark what I say—never in a single report made to Congress does he tell Congress and the country what he is doing. If he had, Congress might have checked him.

Never does he report to Congress that he has destroyed the Puritan, that he has destroyed the Miantonomoh, that he has destroyed the Terror and the Amphitrite, and that he has destroyed about fifteen other vessels. If he had, Congress might have arrested his work. Never does he tell Congress or the country what he has done with their material. Is that all, Mr. Chairman? I state further that no plans for the Miantonomoh, no plans for the Puritan, no plans for the Terror, no plans for the Amphitrite are officially upon the records at the Navy Department unless they have been put there since the investigation was made by the committee of the Forty-fourth Congress.

Yet contracts involving the people of the United States in a liability of millions of dollars, the end whereof no man could then foresee, are made with no plan, no specification, and no measure taken to protect the Government of the United States; no bond or sureties required for the contractors; none of the provisions of law intended for the security of the public moneys or property observed.

Let us look for a moment to the amounts already expended and to be expended on these monitors. There has been paid on them (see the report on this bill, page 8, Secretary Chandler's letter)—

	24,427,618 06

This amount of $24,427,618.06 represents the money and property of the Government placed and to be placed in these vessels.

WHAT ARE THEY WORTH?

I repeat that in these expenditures of money and property no single step was ever taken to protect the people of the United States; not one. Yet now, after these expenditures of about $18,000,000, you are asked to make an appropriation which before you get through will amount to over $6,000,000 to finish these vessels. When you have completed them what are they worth? Turn, if you please, to the testimony of Captain Selfridge. He says, (see Harris's report, page 95:)

Mr. MORSE. Wherein is your ship better than those vessels of our own, which are now unfinished on the stocks?

Captain SELFRIDGE. It is better in power of armament. The ships that are on the stocks are of no use at all.

Mr. MORSE. The principal point with you is—what?

Captain SELFRIDGE. The necessity of building iron-clads—armored vessels—to defend our forts and coast.

Mr. MORSE. Would you finish those vessels that are now on the stocks?

Captain SELFRIDGE. No; I would not. The turrets, with the present artillery that I have spoken of, (the guns being 40 feet in length,) would have to be at least 44 feet in diameter; and the turret with its two guns would weigh at least 1,000 tons, so that it would be impossible to turn it. The European nations have got to adopt this citadel principle. The Inflexible is the last ship that will be ever built by the English navy with turrets. The French have taken up the citadel plan, and the English are bound to follow it.

Captain William N. Jeffers, writing to Secretary Thompson, (see page 381, volume 7, Miscellaneous Document, second session Forty-seventh Congress,) says, after commenting on the report of the Mullany board on the Puritan:

She (the Puritan) is, therefore, for the purposes for which she was designed absolutely useless.

Chief Engineer Isherwood and ex-Chief of Bureau of Construction and Repair Lenthall pronounced the Puritan also a failure. My colleague, General ATKINS, has read their views.

Lenthall's opinions on the double-turreted monitors are fully given in Executive Document No. 82, second session, Forty-sixth Congress, page 11 et seq. He says of the Miantonomoh:

A close imitation of the old original, which, though excellent when built, it would be folly now to copy.

All of the board that have examined them recommend essential changes and modifications.

Chief Engineer King, in his work on the War Ships and Navies of the World, says, on page 387, that—

The advantages possessed by the Miantonomoh over the last two named vessels are lighter draught and a greater number of guns. The advantages are an armor too thin for protection against heavy modern projectiles and the system of the turrets as here applied the same as Ericsson adopted for the first monitors at a time when projectiles were light in weight and discharged with comparatively little power. As good as was the arrangement, the experiences of the war have disclosed in it vulnerable points, and shown that the energy with which modern projectiles are discharged, even from guns of 8 inches and 10 inches caliber, render necessary essential modifications.

I also refer to the testimony of Secretary Thompson. Ah! if gentlemen would read the report of this committee when they are asked to believe that Secretary Thompson made recommendations which would justify them in voting for this appropriation, they would not believe a word of it. Turn and see what Secretary Thompson himself said. Here is the report. He says, as you will see, that the plans must be changed, and unless they be changed he does not recommend the expenditures. But this bill does not recommend any change of plan whatever; no, sir, it sticks to the old methods; it meant to do so.

It is not what Secretary Thompson recommended. Turn to the Mullany board, and it will show you if the Puritan was completed according to the original design she could not float; she would sink. Turn to the Stevens board, and that recommendation is simply that if changes are made in her plan and model she may be made to do. So with the Preble board.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Chairman, I desire just about five minutes more.

Mr. REED. If the gentleman will tell us which provision he is discussing now——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks for five minutes more. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I intended to read from Secretary Thompson, because I do not want to mislead any one, and then to ask you, in view of this array of testimony, together with the facts presented in the Harris report as to the power and efficiency of the vessels of other naval powers, if it is not throwing away money to complete these vessels. A fitting close to this review of the monitors are the facts connected with the attempt of the administration of Mr. ROBESON for their completion. These facts are shown partially but strongly in the testimony of Mr. Moorhead.

Mr. REED. Is it in this bill?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. It is on the monitors. If the monitors are in the bill he refers to them. I refer to Mr. Maxwell K. Moorhead, of Pittsburgh. Here is his testimony.

Mr. Maxwell K. Moorhead, of Pittsburgh, a sworn witness, testified before the Naval Committee of the Forty-fifth Congress (see pages 691 et seq., volume 7, Miscellaneous Documents, Forty-fifth Congress, second session) as follows, after stating the ability of his firm to make plate armor, &c., and their anxiety to furnish the armor for the monitors, that—

I got some letters introducing me to two or three parties in Washington; one from Mr. Oliver to Secretary Cameron, who was then in the War Department. I knew Secretary Cameron very well, but I had this letter written urging him to give me a lift. I presented it to the Secretary, and he said that he would go over with me at any time to see Secretary Robeson. He fixed a time for me to call, and we walked over from the War to the Navy Department. Secretary Robeson was in. He told him our business. He (Secretary Robeson) said that he would not give out those contracts; that they had been urging him to give them out, but that he would not do it, but would leave the business to his successor.

And then, that—

I saw the men here who had the original contracts for building the hulls of the boats. I called upon the Secretary (Robeson) again with the Hon. Allen Wood, jr., a member of Congress from Philadelphia, whom I asked to go with me to see Secretary Robeson. We called upon him, and he told me the same thing he did when I went with Secretary Cameron to see him before: that he would not have anything to do with those boats; that he had no money; that it would take more money than he had then to pay for the kind of work he had already had done; and that he would not give out any more contracts, but leave it to whoever should take office after him. That staggered me. * * * I came on four or five days before the 4th of March, as I had intended to come on for the inauguration. I found the boat-builders here again, and it looked to me as if the Secretary was going to give out those contracts. So I called upon him again the first day I was in town, and he told me he was not going to do anything of the kind; that he had no money to complete those boats.

I then felt that the thing would go over and that they would not be given out, but I remained here to see what was going on. I was about the Department a good deal, and found them all there boat-builders. They all seemed to be very anxious. There was a good deal of whispering and talking going on around, and it looked to me as if they were going to give out this work. I went to Mr. Hanscom on Friday—I think Friday was the 2d of March—and I said to him: "Now, Mr. Hanscom, I am satisfied that these boats are going to be given out, although Secretary Robeson says not, and I would like to know if you are going to give out the Puritan." Says he: "No; you have seen that the plans of the Puritan are not ready, not finished." "Then," says I to him, "you are going to give out the others, I am satisfied, and I want to make a bid." Says he: "Well, you can make a bid."

Then I asked him when I could put it in. He said: "You can put it in to-morrow." I went up in the morning; I made out my bid and dated it on the 2d. I went up to the Departments thinking I could see Secretary Robeson again. I sent in my card, but I could not see him.

After relating how Mr. Hanscom avoided him and that he made a bid, &c., he proceeded to say:

Sunday was the 4th of March and the inauguration took place on the 5th. * * * I saw those boat-builders on Sunday and on Monday, and found from conversation with them that they had contracted for the boats. One of them told me that they had. He said to me that I had made a fool of myself and was so bull-headed that I would not give their price to them for the iron but gave it to the Government, and that that was the way I was cut out. I thought I would go up and see Mr. Hanscom before I went away.

* * * * * * *

I said, "Mr. Hanscom, the thing is up with me," or some remark of that kind. I said, "Our bid was recognized, was it?" Said he, "Yes, and the iron was given out in your bid." "Well," I said, "if the iron was given out on our bid they got a low bid and I have saved the Government something." "Yes," said he, "it will save the Government over $100,000, according to my figuring." It would have amounted to something more than that. His clerk was standing there when I made the remark that I thought it pretty hard on me, if I had saved the Government over $100,000, not to get the work; that it was a pretty rough thing on the only man in the country who could make this iron. He said, "I wanted the thing separated, but the Secretary would not agree to that, and he thought the man who built the boats ought to have the whole thing, and would not separate them." He (Hanscom) said, "I wanted to separate the contracts."

After reciting other details and stating what contractors were here and that the monitors were the "boats" spoken of, he was asked the following questions, to which he gave the following answers:

Question. I ask you if, at the time you speak of, there were not here what might be termed a congregation of contractors about the Department.

Answer. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you get information from any quarter or quarters that these contracts were likely to be made?

A. We got information from Ways & Co. that these contracts would be made before Mr. ROBESON went out. They felt certain of it. The only reason I had to think that they were very certain about these contracts being let out was that every time I came here I found these men. I staid as long as they staid and then I went back.

Q. If I understand you correctly, you say that every time you saw the Secretary of the Navy he informed you that the contracts would not be let out for want of an appropriation sufficient to make them?

A. Yes, sir; he said that his appropriation would not pay the amount of work that had already been done on them.

As appropriate to this closing scene of a "contracting administration," I would refer to the immense amount of purchases made in its last hours. I would draw for you the pictures of the contractors gathering around the carrion which they supposed to be there at that time, and that it was their last opportunity, and that in the letting of these contracts for completing these monitors, and the making of contracts for timber, &c., and the payments to favorites, a legacy to the United States Government of over $7,000,000 of liabilities beyond appropriations was left, a costly memorial of the Robeson administration.

And I intended in that connection to refer to the report of the late Secretary of the Navy, Hon. R. W. Thompson, as to this indebtedness; and I intended, as I do now in my closing remarks, to say in reference to that administration, it was to be expected from the author of the Clews letter, (which see in appendix,) and that it was to be expected from the associate of E. G. Cattell and others—but the time allotted me is too brief, and I can but thank the committee for their attention.

APPENDIX No. 5.

[Extract from Harris's report.]

The Naval Register last issued brings official information concerning the Navy down to January 1, 1882. The list of one hundred and forty vessels there given is made up of the following classes:

Steam-vessels:
First-rates	13
Second-rates	20
Third-rates	27
Fourth-rates, including two torpedo-boats	8
Total	68

Yet contracts involving the people of the United States in a liability of millions of dollars, the end whereof no man could then foresee, are made with no plan, no specification, and no measure taken to protect the Government of the United States; no bond or sureties required for the contractors; none of the provisions of law intended for the security of the public moneys or property observed.

Let us look for a moment to the amounts already expended and to be expended on these monitors. There has been paid on them (see the report on this bill, page 8, Secretary Chandler's letter)—

MIANTONOMOH AND PURITAN.

Miantonomoh		$1,136,191 87

Add Wassuc	552,374 51
Total cost in money and the original cost of vessels paid over on account of these monitors	18,225,418 06
Amount estimated cost to finish and complete as effective war vessels, (see answer to HEWITT'S resolution, Executive Document No. 30, first session Forty-seventh Congress)	6,202,200 00
	24,427,618 06

This amount of $24,427,618.06 represents the money and property of the Government placed and to be placed in these vessels.

WHAT ARE THEY WORTH?

I repeat that in these expenditures of money and property no single step was ever taken to protect the people of the United States; not one. Yet now, after these expenditures of about $18,000,000, you are asked to make an appropriation which before you get through will amount to over $6,000,000 to finish these vessels. When you have completed them what are they worth? Turn, if you please, to the testimony of Captain Selfridge. He says, (see Harris's report, page 95:)

Mr. MORSE. Wherein is your ship better than those vessels of our own, which are now unfinished on the stocks?

Captain SELFRIDGE. It is better in power of armament. The ships that are on the stocks are of no use at all.

Mr. MORSE. The principal point with you is—what?

Captain SELFRIDGE. The necessity of building iron-clads—armored vessels—to defend our forts and coast.

Mr. MORSE. Would you finish those vessels that are now on the stocks?

Captain SELFRIDGE. No; I would not. The turrets, with the present artillery that I have spoken of, (the guns being 40 feet in length,) would have to be at least 44 feet in diameter; and the turret with its two guns would weigh at least 1,000 tons, so that it would be impossible to turn it. The European nations have got to adopt this citadel principle. The Inflexible is the last ship that will be ever built by the English navy with turrets. The French have taken up the citadel plan, and the English are bound to follow it.

Captain William N. Jeffers, writing to Secretary Thompson, (see page 381, volume 7, Miscellaneous Document, second session Forty-seventh Congress,) says, after commenting on the report of the Mullany board on the Puritan:

She (the Puritan) is, therefore, for the purposes for which she was designed absolutely useless.

Chief Engineer Isherwood and ex-Chief of Bureau of Construction and Repair Lenthall pronounced the Puritan also a failure. My colleague, General ATKINS, has read their views.

Lenthall's opinions on the double-turreted monitors are fully given in Executive Document No. 82, second session, Forty-sixth Congress, page 11 et seq. He says of the Miantonomoh:

A close imitation of the old original, which, though excellent when built, it would be folly now to copy.

All of the board that have examined them recommend essential changes and modifications.

Chief Engineer King, in his work on the War Ships and Navies of the World, says, on page 387, that—

The advantages possessed by the Miantonomoh over the last two named vessels are lighter draught and a greater number of guns. The advantages are an armor too thin for protection against heavy modern projectiles and the system of the turrets as here applied the same as Ericsson adopted for the first monitors at a time when projectiles were light in weight and discharged with comparatively little power. As good as was the arrangement, the experiences of the war have disclosed in it vulnerable points, and shown that the energy with which modern projectiles are discharged, even from guns of 8 inches and 10 inches caliber, render necessary essential modifications.

I also refer to the testimony of Secretary Thompson. Ah! if gentlemen would read the report of this committee when they are asked to believe that Secretary Thompson made recommendations which would justify them in voting for this appropriation, they would not believe a word of it. Turn and see what Secretary Thompson himself said. Here is the report. He says, as you will see, that the plans must be changed, and unless they be changed he does not recommend the expenditures. But this bill does not recommend any change of plan whatever; no, sir, it sticks to the old methods; it meant to do so.

It is not what Secretary Thompson recommended. Turn to the Mullany board, and it will show you if the Puritan was completed according to the original design she could not float; she would sink. Turn to the Stevens board, and that recommendation is simply that if changes are made in her plan and model she may be made to do. So with the Preble board.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Chairman, I desire just about five minutes more.

Mr. REED. If the gentleman will tell us which provision he is discussing now——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks for five minutes more. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I intended to read from Secretary Thompson, because I do not want to mislead any one, and then to ask you, in view of this array of testimony, together with the facts presented in the Harris report as to the power and efficiency of the vessels of other naval powers, if it is not throwing away money to complete these vessels. A fitting close to this review of the monitors are the facts connected with the attempt of the administration of Mr. ROBESON for their completion. These facts are shown partially but strongly in the testimony of Mr. Moorhead.

Mr. REED. Is it in this bill?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. It is on the monitors. If the monitors are in the bill he refers to them. I refer to Mr. Maxwell K. Moorhead, of Pittsburgh. Here is his testimony.

Mr. Maxwell K. Moorhead, of Pittsburgh, a sworn witness, testified before the Naval Committee of the Forty-fifth Congress (see pages 691 et seq., volume 7, Miscellaneous Documents, Forty-fifth Congress, second session) as follows, after stating the ability of his firm to make plate armor, &c., and their anxiety to furnish the armor for the monitors, that—

I got some letters introducing me to two or three parties in Washington; one from Mr. Oliver to Secretary Cameron, who was then in the War Department. I knew Secretary Cameron very well, but I had this letter written urging him to give me a lift. I presented it to the Secretary, and he said that he would go over with me at any time to see Secretary Robeson. He fixed a time for me to call, and we walked over from the War to the Navy Department. Secretary Robeson was in. He told him our business. He (Secretary Robeson) said that he would not give out those contracts; that they had been urging him to give them out, but that he would not do it, but would leave the business to his successor.

And then, that—

I saw the men here who had the original contracts for building the hulls of the boats. I called upon the Secretary (Robeson) again with the Hon. Allen Wood, jr., a member of Congress from Philadelphia, whom I asked to go with me to see Secretary Robeson. We called upon him, and he told me the same thing he did when I went with Secretary Cameron to see him before: that he would not have anything to do with those boats; that he had no money; that it would take more money than he had then to pay for the kind of work he had already had done; and that he would not give out any more contracts, but leave it to whoever should take office after him. That staggered me. * * * I came on four or five days before the 4th of March, as I had intended to come on for the inauguration. I found the boat-builders here again, and it looked to me as if the Secretary was going to give out those contracts. So I called upon him again the first day I was in town, and he told me he was not going to do anything of the kind; that he had no money to complete those boats.

I then felt that the thing would go over and that they would not be given out, but I remained here to see what was going on. I was about the Department a good deal, and found them all there boat-builders. They all seemed to be very anxious. There was a good deal of whispering and talking going on around, and it looked to me as if they were going to give out this work. I went to Mr. Hanscom on Friday—I think Friday was the 2d of March—and I said to him: "Now, Mr. Hanscom, I am satisfied that these boats are going to be given out, although Secretary Robeson says not, and I would like to know if you are going to give out the Puritan." Says he: "No; you have seen that the plans of the Puritan are not ready, not finished." "Then," says I to him, "you are going to give out the others, I am satisfied, and I want to make a bid." Says he: "Well, you can make a bid."

Then I asked him when I could put it in. He said: "You can put it in to-morrow." I went up in the morning; I made out my bid and dated it on the 2d. I went up to the Departments thinking I could see Secretary Robeson again. I sent in my card, but I could not see him.

After relating how Mr. Hanscom avoided him and that he made a bid, &c., he proceeded to say:

Sunday was the 4th of March and the inauguration took place on the 5th. * * * I saw those boat-builders on Sunday and on Monday, and found from conversation with them that they had contracted for the boats. One of them told me that they had. He said to me that I had made a fool of myself and was so bull-headed that I would not give their price to them for the iron but gave it to the Government, and that that was the way I was cut out. I thought I would go up and see Mr. Hanscom before I went away.

* * * * * * *

I said, "Mr. Hanscom, the thing is up with me," or some remark of that kind. I said, "Our bid was recognized, was it?" Said he, "Yes, and the iron was given out in your bid." "Well," I said, "if the iron was given out on our bid they got a low bid and I have saved the Government something." "Yes," said he, "it will save the Government over $100,000, according to my figuring." It would have amounted to something more than that. His clerk was standing there when I made the remark that I thought it pretty hard on me, if I had saved the Government over $100,000, not to get the work; that it was a pretty rough thing on the only man in the country who could make this iron. He said, "I wanted the thing separated, but the Secretary would not agree to that, and he thought the man who built the boats ought to have the whole thing, and would not separate them." He (Hanscom) said, "I wanted to separate the contracts."

After reciting other details and stating what contractors were here and that the monitors were the "boats" spoken of, he was asked the following questions, to which he gave the following answers:

Question. I ask you if, at the time you speak of, there were not here what might be termed a congregation of contractors about the Department.

Answer. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you get information from any quarter or quarters that these contracts were likely to be made?

A. We got information from Ways & Co. that these contracts would be made before Mr. ROBESON went out. They felt certain of it. The only reason I had to think that they were very certain about these contracts being let out was that every time I came here I found these men. I staid as long as they staid and then I went back.

Q. If I understand you correctly, you say that every time you saw the Secretary of the Navy he informed you that the contracts would not be let out for want of an appropriation sufficient to make them?

A. Yes, sir; he said that his appropriation would not pay the amount of work that had already been done on them.

As appropriate to this closing scene of a "contracting administration," I would refer to the immense amount of purchases made in its last hours. I would draw for you the pictures of the contractors gathering around the carrion which they supposed to be there at that time, and that it was their last opportunity, and that in the letting of these contracts for completing these monitors, and the making of contracts for timber, &c., and the payments to favorites, a legacy to the United States Government of over $7,000,000 of liabilities beyond appropriations was left, a costly memorial of the Robeson administration.

And I intended in that connection to refer to the report of the late Secretary of the Navy, Hon. R. W. Thompson, as to this indebtedness; and I intended, as I do now in my closing remarks, to say in reference to that administration, it was to be expected from the author of the Clews letter, (which see in appendix,) and that it was to be expected from the associate of E. G. Cattell and others—but the time allotted me is too brief, and I can but thank the committee for their attention.

Total number of vessels of all classes	140

On the 10th day of January last this committee made a report (No. 139) to the House on the subject of the bill (H. R. No. 677) entitled "A bill to provide a permanent construction fund for the Navy, and for other purposes," in which they give a list of eight steam-vessels which are unfinished on the stocks in the navy-yards, rotten and utterly worthless. That list is as follows:

Name.	Age.	Guns.	Tonnage.	Displacement.	Location.
Connecticut	1867	21	2,869	4,450	Boston navy-yard.
Pennsylvania	1867	22	2,490	4,000	Boston navy-yard.

Virginia	1818	.....	2,600	4,150	Boston, partly cut down.
New Orleans	1818	.....	.....	4,150	Sackett's Harbor.

Another list is given of fourteen vessels, which includes only worn-out, obsolete, and worthless vessels, which it would be shameless folly and unpardonable extravagance to attempt to repair, having no possible present or prospective use, and which cost annually a considerable sum to guard and save from depredation by harbor thieves. That list is appended:

STEAM-VESSELS.

Still another list is given which includes eight old sailing-ships and two iron-clads, all of which, with perhaps the exception of the iron-clad Dictator, are utterly worthless for naval purposes and wholly unworthy of repair. That list is as follows:

SAILING-VESSELS.

Ohio	1820	5	2,700	4,250	Boston navy-yard.
Constitution	1797 and 1876	6	1,335	2,200	League Island navy-yard.

Of the twenty-five "tugs, &c.," borne on the Naval Register, the committee estimate that at least ten are worn out and useless and which should be sold or demolished. If the committee are correct in their estimate, here are forty-two out of one hundred and forty vessels of all classes whose names appear as part of the "Navy of the United States," representing not only no naval power whatever but which can hereafter serve no useful purpose, and which are, moreover, a constant drain on the appropriations for the support of the Navy, and a consequent loss to the Government to the extent of the cost of their protection, which aggregates annually no small sum.

As an illustration, we may take the case of the Niagara, at Boston, which has been tied up to her dock, a worthless hulk, since the attempt to repair her, nearly or quite eighteen years ago, was abandoned. She has cost for her care alone since that time more than $98,000, and it is doubtful if she is worth to-day or will bring $25,000 at auction. Other instances of the same kind are numerous, and the statistics on that subject are in preparation and will be laid before Congress. We regret that we are unable to present them in this report for want of time for their completion.

From the list of one hundred and forty vessels whose names are borne on the Register, forty-two thus fall out at once, without question or doubt, and we are left with a total Navy of only ninety-eight vessels of all classes. But this does not by any means tell the story of our naval weakness, for of these ninety-eight fifteen are but navy-yard tugs, which are not serviceable for war purposes. We therefore treat them as tools, useful in navy-yards and naval stations, as are other tools and machines, as a part of the plant rather than as vessels of the Navy, and we strike them out of the ninety-eight, leaving only eighty-three as the total number of our vessels of the Navy capable of service.

But our humiliation is not yet complete. Of these eighty-three fourteen are old sailing-vessels of a bygone age and of an outgrown and abandoned system. We give their names, ages, tonnage, guns, and their present location and use:

Name.	When built.	No. of guns.	Tonnage.	Displacement.	Location and use.
New Hampshire	1818	15	2,600	4,150	Repairing at Norfolk for training-ship for boys.
Vermont	1848	19	2,400	4,150	Receiving-ship at New York.
Constellation	1797 and 1854	10	1,236	1,886	Practice-ship at Naval Academy.
Independence	1814	22	1,891	3,270	Receiving-ship at Mare Island, California.
Santee	1855	48	1,475	2,430	Gunnery-ship at Naval Academy, Annapolis, Maryland.
Portsmouth	1843	12	846	1,125	Apprentice training-ship.
Jamestown	1844	12	888	1,150	Fitting for apprentice training-ship.
Saratoga	1843	12	757	1,025	Training-ship at Washington; a hulk.

Dale	1839	8	320	675	Practice-ship at Naval Academy, Annapolis, Maryland.
Pawnee	1858	.....	872	1,650	Store-ship at Port Royal
Onward	(*)	3	704	.....	Store-ship at Callao, Peru.
Freda	(*)	.....	.....	.....	Mare Island, California

*Purchased.

By deducting these our list falls from 83 to 69. These 69 include steam-vessels only and were intended for war purposes. This number must be again reduced by withdrawing the name of the Arctic ship Rogers, which was purchased for and sent out on the humane mission of rescuing lost Arctic explorers, and the names of four double-turreted iron-clad monitors, now on the stocks in the private yards of contractors at Wilmington, Chester, Philadelphia, and Mare Island, with the question of their fate still undecided, namely: Amphitrite, Puritan, Terror, and Monadnock; and also the name of the Miantonomoh, now afloat at League Island, Pennsylvania, new and in perfect condition and ready for sea; except that having neither turrets nor guns she has no excuse for going to sea. With this reduction our list falls to 63. But if we seek our present real naval power for active service at sea we must continue this dissolving view. The following table gives the names, ages, displacement, tonnage, guns, and present use of several steam-vessels of the Navy, some of which are not in present condition for service, some of which can never be made so, and all of which are of very doubtful value to the service:

Name.	When built.	Guns.	Tonnage.	Displacement.	Present location, condition and use.
Franklin	1854	39	3,173	5,170	Receiving-ship at Norfolk.
Colorado	1855	46	3,032	4,700	Receiving-ship at New York
Minnesota	1855	46	3,000	4,700	Training-ship at Newport Rhode Island.
Wabash	1854	45	3,000	4,650	Receiving-ship at Boston.
New York	1865	21	2,490	4,070	A frame on the stocks at New York; live oak; worthy of being finished.
Iowa	1865	25	2,019	4,000	Probably worthless; at Boston; machinery taken out; white oak; built at close of the war; very fast; did no service.
Antietam	1865	21	2,490	4,000	A mere hulk; at League Island; white oak; launched in 1874; used as store-ship and marine barracks; no machinery on board.
Michigan	1844	8	450	685	Iron paddle-wheel lake boat at Erie, Pa.; should give place to a vessel of war to fill treaty rights of United States.
Tallapoosa	1863 and 1874	2	650	1,270	A transport used by Navy Department; lately repaired; a good vessel and useful to the Government in this service.
Dispatch	Purchased.	4	730	.....	A mere dispatch vessel; a purchased pleasure yacht; fast, and useful to the Government in this service.
Intrepid	1870	.....	311	800	Built for torpedo service; strong and able, but too slow; could be made useful if completed; no torpedo machinery on board.

It is manifest that these vessels can be of little if any practical service in actual war, and we deduct them from our list, which reduces the Navy to fifty-two. But of this reduced number 14 are of the single-turreted monitor class, not suited for cruising service, and only to be relied upon for coast and harbor defense. They are good vessels of their class, have been rebuilt of iron, or rather have had their old wooden beams replaced with iron since the war. Whether good or bad, they are all we have in the nature of iron-clad harbor defenders afloat and armed, and yet there is not one breech-loading rifled gun of any size in the entire fleet. They are all armed with smooth-bore guns of large caliber, but of small power and short range. They did good service during the war in a contest with an enemy which had no navy. Some of them bear the scars of war, and are objects of respect and veneration, but it is unsafe longer to rely on them as our sole defense against the powerful navies of modern times. They are all classed as fourth-rates, and are as follows, with their guns, tonnage, &c.:

Name.	When built.	Guns.	Tonnage.	Displacement.	Location.
Ajax	1865	2	550	2,100	City Point, James River.
Canonicus	1864	2	550	2,100	Navy-yard, Pensacola.
Camanche	1865	2	496	1,875	In ordinary, Mare Island, California.
Catskill	1863	2	496	1,875	City Point.
Jason	1863	2	496	1,875	League Island, Pennsylvania.
Lehigh	1866	2	496	1,875	City Point.
Mahopac	1864	2	550	2,100	City Point.
Manhattan	1864	2	550	2,100	City Point.
Montauk	1863	2	496	1,875	In commission, Washington.
Nahant	1863	2	496	1,875	League Island.
Nantucket	1863	2	496	1,875	Annapolis, Maryland.
Passaic	1862	2	946	1,875	Receiving-ship, Washington.
Sangus	1864	2	550	2,100	Laid up at Washington.
Wyandotte	1866	2	550	2,100	In commission, Washington.

We have now left to account for only thirty-eight vessels, and in this number is to be found all the naval power for ocean service of the United States. We annex a table of these thirty-eight vessels, their ages, tonnage, displacement, and guns, their present service, or location, if out of active service. We give them by classes as they stand in the Register:

It may seem useless to further point out the weakness of our Navy, but it is best that the whole truth be known now, so that we who have the responsibility for the future peace and safety of the country upon us may have the perils and dangers of neglect of present duty clearly before us. A careful examination of the last table, in which is displayed the whole of our offensive naval power, will satisfy any person that many of the vessels there named are old and nearly worn out, slow in speed, feeble in offensive power, and utterly deficient in defensive power, even in the power of running away from danger, and which, when war comes, will only be safe behind fortifications or unapproachable harbors.

APPENDIX No. 10.

Extract from letter of Secretary Robeson to Henry Clews, in relation to selection of Jay Cooke as fiscal agent of the Government at London. (See Brooklyn testimony, Forty-fourth Congress; investigation of the Navy Department, page 260, volume 3:)

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 23, 1871.

MY DEAR CLEWS: I have your letter of the 19th instant, in regard to the appointment of a fiscal agent of the Government abroad. I am sorry I was absent when you were here, for I could have explained to you personally much more fully and satisfactorily the situation of this matter. The truth is that the Navy Department really has no fiscal agent abroad, but has hitherto kept its accounts with Baring Brothers & Co., of London. This account I transferred about the 1st of the month to Jay Cooke's house abroad. This I did for the broadest political as well as financial reasons, looking to the good of the service abroad, as well as the strengthening of the party and the Administra ion at home.

The house of Jay Cooke & Co. has, as you know, large and extended interests and influence throughout the country. Their connection and influence with the national banks; with the Pennsylvania Railroad, which controls the State of Pennsylvania, and which, absorbing the Camden and Amboy Railroad, now controls New Jersey, and stretches from its western terminus across many of the Western States far toward the Pacific; their interest in the Northern Pacific, and their general interest in the country, make them very powerful friends when actively interested in the success of the Administration, and dangerous enemies in vital localities when indifferent or unfriendly.

* * * * * *

Very truly, your friend,

GEO. M. ROBESON.

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the hammer fell.

Mr. ELLIS. I suggest that the gentleman's time be extended by unanimous consent; and I will ask the same courtesy for the other side when the reply shall come.

Mr. HISCOCK. How long does the gentleman want?

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman allow me in all courtesy to say that because the time for the discussion of this bill has been limited against the wishes of many on this side of the House as well as of many gentlemen on the other side, to ask whether he would print the rest of his remarks, or if it would be equally satisfactory to him to do so? I only throw this out as a suggestion in view of the fact I have stated.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I hope the time of the gentleman will be extended, and an equal extension given to this side of the House.

Mr. McMILLIN. Certainly.

Mr. HISCOCK. The time for general debate is limited——

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I hope unanimous consent will be given——

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman propose?

Mr. ELLIS. I should suggest half an hour's additional time be allowed.

Mr. BOWMAN. If the time allowed for debate can be extended beyond two o'clock to-morrow, then I should not object to an extension of half an hour.

Mr. ROBESON. I hope the time will be given.

Mr. STEELE. I object if the extension continues the debate beyond two o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BOWMAN. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman from Tennessee shall go on if he does not wish to print the remainder of his remarks; but it is apparent that it takes half an hour away from some other gentleman who has not yet had an opportunity of being heard.

Mr. ELLIS. I hope the extension of time will be given, and there will be no question as to the extension of an equal length of time to gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. CANNON. I want to ask if there is anybody who wishes to say anything on this bill?

Mr. BOWMAN. I know some gentlemen on this side of the House who do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection to the request that the gentleman be allowed to continue for half an hour.

Mr. STEELE. With the understanding that this does not extend the time beyond two o'clock to-morrow.

The CHAIRMAN. It cannot be extended beyond that time unless by order of the House; the committee cannot do it. The gentleman from Tennessee will proceed.

Mr. WHITTHORNE then resumed and concluded his remarks as above.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

The message also announced the approval of bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 2313) authorizing the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge over the Missouri River;

An act (H. R. No. 6410) to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the sale of the lands of the Miami Indians in Kansas," approved May 15, 1882;

An act (H. R. No. 6335) authorizing the national bank of Kutztown to change its location and name;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 229) authorizing the Secretary of War to turn over to the governor of Minnesota such tents, poles, and pins as he may require for the use of the militia and volunteer organizations of the State at their summer and fall encampment;

An act (H. R. No. 4842) to authorize the Southern Maryland Railroad Company to extend a railroad into and within the District of Columbia;

An act (H. R. No. 4710) to vacate a certain part of Rock street in Georgetown, in the District of Columbia; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 239) making an appropriation to continue the work of observation and exploration in the Arctic seas.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment House bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 224) accepting the offer of Dr. H. D. Cogswell, of San Francisco, California, to donate to the Government of the United States an ornamental drinking-fountain, to be erected at his cost in the city of Washington;

A bill (H. R. No. 6519) to authorize the construction of bridges over the rivers Saint Mary's, Satella, Little Satella, and Crooker, in the States of Georgia and Florida; and

A bill (H. R. No. 6225) to authorize the changing of alley-ways in the city of Washington.

The message also informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the reports of the conference committees on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 5664) making appropriations to provide for the expense of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; and

The bill (H. R. No. 3830) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill and joint resolutions of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Joint resolution (S. 77) allowing the widow of General Judson Kilpatrick, late minister to Chili, one year's salary;

Joint resolution (S. 75) allowing the widow of General Stephen A. Hurlbut, late minister to Peru, one year's salary; and

A bill (S. 1963) to attach the parishes of Saint Mary's and Iberia, in the State of Louisiana, to the western judicial district of Louisiana.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Chairman, I hoped when the time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] was extended he would address some of his remarks to this committee in reference to some provisions in the bill which some of us are opposed to. I supposed when he rose to speak this morning he was going to persuade the committee that certain provisions contained in the bill should not be adopted. Instead of that, in place of discussing the bill itself, he has given us his history of the Navy for the last ten or twelve or fourteen years. I suppose to himself it is very interesting. He may have rewritten his speech or not; I do not know; but at all events he has not helped those of us who wish to have certain provisions of the bill stricken out.

Now, at the close of his address he mentioned the name of a gentleman, Mr. Cattell, whose acquaintance I have enjoyed during many years of my life, and the abuse of whom comes with a bad grace from the gentleman from Tennessee. He has no right here in this committee to arraign the character of any gentleman who has done business with the Government Departments and who is not present to defend himself. I protest against it.

Mr. Chairman, this appropriation bill does not appropriate a very extraordinarily large amount. The aggregate is something over $15,000,000. That aggregate is reached in a very peculiar way, for the amounts submitted by the Navy Department through the Secretary of the Treasury in his letter of estimates as to what would be required for carrying on the business of the Department for the next fiscal year have been very largely cut down, the general rule of the Committee on Appropriations being that all the estimates must be reduced in the appropriation bills reported by that committee. While I have been ready to co-operate with the Committee on Appropriations in the interest of proper economy in expenditures of the Government, I am not one of those who adhere closely to the idea of that kind of reform which is a hinderance to the operations of the Departments or which impairs their usefulness. Hence, I object to many of the provisions contained in this bill; and while it should have remained simply an appropriation bill, it has in it much new legislation, more, I may be permitted to say, than any other appropriation bill for the Navy Department I have ever known.

Now, sir, I am opposed to that provision, in the first instance, which seems to lodge absolutely in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy the power to close certain of the navy-yards, or rather to take from certain of the navy-yards work which usually would be done in them. I have not heard of any letter communicated to this House from the Secretary of the Navy asking for such power. I do not know what his ultimate idea may be, or what conclusion he may have reached in connection with this subject; but it has never been communicated to the House in any public manner, and I do not believe in giving him the power to begin to take one step in the way of abolishing navy-yards by showing a preference of one over the other as to doing or not doing work in any particular yard, which the adoption of this proposition would certainly allow.

Of course I do not mean to be understood as asserting that this bill or that this provision of the bill abolishes certain navy-yards. My whole point is this, that through this bill there is an effort made to put an absolute power in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy to shut up whatever navy-yards he may see fit; in other words, to take from certain navy-yards the work which should be sent to them and give that work to other yards which might be selected by him. Now, I ask the gentleman who has reported this bill whether he does not know to-day that there is a power of that kind lodged in the Secretary of the Navy; not a power so absolute that he can take from one navy-yard the entire work going on and give it to another, but does he not know it is in the power of the Secretary of the Navy to-day when a ship comes off a cruise to say into what navy-yard it shall go to be repaired?

Hence I fear we do not understand thoroughly this provision of the bill. The Secretary of the Navy, when a vessel comes off a cruise which has to be repaired, orders absolutely what navy-yard that vessel shall go to to have those repairs made. He has always had that power, and no one knows better than the gentleman from New Jersey himself, because he may recollect when he was Secretary he had many a visit from me to ask him to have a vessel or vessels sent to the League Island navy-yard that the skilled laborers and mechanics of Philadelphia might have an opportunity of doing work—work unsurpassed by the work of any laborers or mechanics in the country. I say there is power enough now in that direction in the Secretary of the Navy. He also now can direct in which of the navy-yards new ships shall be built, but Congress I think will not be inclined by such radical legislation as is here proposed to grant in these respects additional power to that already vested. I do not want this power extended in the slightest degree. In other words, I want to see this provision stricken out of the bill. The next proviso here is also very remarkable:

Provided further, That the navy-yard at Washington, District of Columbia, may, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, be maintained as a manufacturing yard for the Bureaus of Equipment and Recruiting, and Ordnance, and that work may be continued in the rope-walk in the Boston navy-yard.

We are asked here to legislate to maintain these two navy-yards. That is, we are giving to the Secretary the idea that those yards must be retained for some purpose or other. I do not believe, however, that the retention of the Boston navy-yard for the purposes of a rope-walk will be satisfactory to the gentleman representing the locality in which that navy-yard is situated. I do not know about the Washington navy-yard. I do not know what the wishes of the officers of the Navy and the people who are interested in it may be.

Mr. ATKINS. May I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question?

Mr. O'NEILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. ATKINS. Does the gentleman not believe there are more navy-yards than are necessary?

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Chairman, that is rather a pointed question, but I will answer it.

Mr. ATKINS. Is not the legislation proposed by this bill what the people want?

Mr. O'NEILL. No, sir; the legislation of Congress for the past twenty years on this subject was the legislation demanded by circumstances as they arose, and has been the legislation that the people wanted. Now, what does the gentleman think of that answer?

Mr. ATKINS. I think it is a very poor answer to my question. I do not think it is an answer at all.

Mr. O'NEILL. No doubt the gentleman thinks it is a very poor answer. But I recollect the day when every navy-yard open in this country was wanted, and when it was used, and used well, and used according to the wishes of the people of the country.

Mr. ATKINS. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania another question, if he will permit me. Does he not believe the naval authorities are better qualified to decide what are the wants of the service as to the number of navy-yards and where they should be located than either he or I?

Mr. O'NEILL. Whom do you mean by the naval authorities?

Mr. ATKINS. I mean the Secretary of the Navy, with all the sources of instruction from naval officers at his command.

Mr. O'NEILL. No, sir.

Mr. ATKINS. And the President of the United States, who is the commander of the Army and the Navy.

Mr. O'NEILL. No, sir; I will take any individual man who has been Secretary of the Navy and any individual officer of the Navy, and I will not yield to him that he has a better idea of where a navy-yard should be or what a navy-yard should be than I, as a member of the House of Representatives, or any other member of the House of Representatives. I claim that a member of this House has as good judgment as any gentleman who has ever been Secretary of the Navy or any man who has been an officer of the Navy.

Mr. ATKINS. If it will not interrupt my friend from Philadelphia, I should like to ask him another question.

Mr. O'NEILL. It does not annoy me at all to be interrupted; I rather like it.

Mr. ATKINS. My question is one pertinent to this bill. We ought to understand what we are to do about this bill. Does the gentleman believe if this House should conclude there are too many navy-yards this House should strike out certain navy-yards and order certain others to be retained?

Mr. O'NEILL. Why, Mr. Chairman, I have to obey the mandates of this House. Whatever legislation this Congress or this House of Representatives proposes and carries through, though I may be opposed to it, as I would be opposed to abolishing any navy-yards, of course I would have to yield to the law of the land. But so long as I have a voice in this committee, and on the floor of the House, I will stand here and protest against abolishing navy-yards which have cost the Government a great deal of money to properly prepare for naval purposes and which the Government in accepting property as gifts from certain localities for navy-yards has in all equitable construction of the laws under which the property was accepted pledged the donors that navy-yards should be maintained thereon.

The gentleman who reported this bill is exceedingly able to defend himself, and I do not propose to undertake his defense in any particular. I only want to say something to him just here.

The day was, while he was performing the duties of the Secretaryship of the Navy, when every navy-yard upon the Atlantic coast showed its great usefulness and its great convenience. No one knows it better than he does. I need not tell him when that was. We all recollect very well the Virginius excitement. Many of us were here at the time. I only want to say to the gentleman who reported this bill, the ex-Secretary of the Navy, that even in the midst of war, yes, even in the midst of the rebellion, no man who ever occupied that position ever did more for the honor and credit of the country than he did when he asked for and expended $4,000,000 in fitting up a navy the best he could to show the Government of Spain that we would protect our rights, and his patriotic exertions in preparing vessels for active duty almost of itself prevented then a war with that power.

It was one of the crowning honors he was permitted to have placed on his brow in the midst of his administration, so patriotic and so noble, of the Navy Department of the Government. Then every navy-yard on the Atlantic coast was of service to the Government—at Portsmouth, at Boston, at New London, at Norfolk, at Philadelphia, at Pensacola—and so they may be again.

But I am getting away to a certain extent from the provisions of the bill. I do not say that the bill proposes to legislate out of use these navy-yards; but it is a step in that direction. I want to warn my colleagues and other gentlemen in the Committee of the Whole to beware how they vote to put this power into the hands of the Secretary of the Navy, who has never asked it of this committee or of the Committee on Appropriations.

I will say here that I have studied the history of our Navy a great deal. I have looked a great deal into the management of the Navy Department. It has been one of the Departments of the Government where it has been my privilege and my pleasure to go time and again, more often perhaps, or as often as any member on this floor.

I desire to say that if the administration of that Department, such as we have had for the last five years, had been allowed to go on much longer we would have had no Navy at all. We have not much of a Navy as it is; but if the ideas of the two last occupants of that Department had been continued much longer our Navy would have been dwindled to nothing. They either had not the courage to ask for appropriations whereby they could begin to build up a Navy or to renew our Navy, or they seemed to fear and tremble when they were called upon to expend a dollar for the purpose of making the Navy even what under the appropriations granted, or which should have been urgently asked for, an American Navy should have been.

I am glad that to-day we have a man of energy at the head of that Department, a man of business tact, a man who I know will conduct his administration in a way that will gratify and satisfy the American people. I do not intend to say much more upon this bill. I want to give an opportunity out of my time to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] to speak. I would like to hear from twenty-five or thirty other gentlemen who represent portions of this country in which navy-yards are located. I would like to hear their sentiments, because I know that they each of them represent the sentiments of the people.

The people of the country will be shocked when the day comes that any of these navy-yards are abolished, after the expenditure of money upon them and their uses in the past of which we all know; shocked because they know the day may come when these navy-yards may be useful again. They are so located that everything that goes into the building of ships can be found almost upon its native soil, so to speak.

Let the navy-yards remain where they are; the navy-yards as we have them to-day. There may not be opportunities of getting such locations again. I do not know but there may be an idea in the minds of some of establishing some new navy-yard. I do not care about that. Let us hold on to what we have, and do not by adopting this section step over a threshold which may lead to the abolition of most of the navy-yards of the country.

Do we not want navy-yards on the Atlantic coast? Suppose that the navy-yards should be reduced to those at Brooklyn and at League Island. Of course I know that never by the vote of Congress will the League Island navy-yard be abolished. And then there are the navy-yards at Norfolk and Mare Island which Congress would not abandon. Why should we not have a navy-yard at Portsmouth and at New London? We cannot do without those which have been established and are in operation. They all have been carefully selected and are judiciously located.

I feel very warmly on this subject. I believe in a navy. I do not believe in the idea advocated by my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.] I believe that this country could and should sustain a great navy. I do not know that it is necessary for us to rank as the greatest naval power of the earth, but 50,000,000 of people in a country like ours I believe should have a navy commensurate with their greatness, their progress, and with the immensity of their commercial business interests. And I for one must object to another part of this bill, because it does not provide for finishing the five iron-clads. I think there should be in the bill an appropriation large enough to finish them. I do not know that it is necessary for me to go over their names; they are pretty hard names to get over, but I think I can do it. I mean the Monadnock, the Puritan, the Terror, the Miantonomoh, and the Amphitrite. I believe it ought to be considered the duty of this committee and of the House to appropriate sufficient money to finish those monitors and put them all in order.

As the gentleman who reported this bill has well said, they are monitors and vessels of war which could almost destroy any vessel known in the world by their power and force.

I do not like to separate from the members of the Committee on Appropriations on this bill. It has been adopted by a large majority of that committee, almost every member in a general way. But I believe in being ever ready to protect the interests of this country, and that the American people are attached to the Navy. They like their naval heroes. They will never forget the heroes of all our wars who have graced the Navy of the United States and distinguished the country. I do not like many of the ideas which are contained in this bill, and which are entering-wedges for the destruction of certain navy-yards and for the reorganizing of the Navy, so as to legislate in a few years out of service men who have distinguished themselves greatly and who have helped to save us in our day of tribulation.

As I want my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] to be heard, I will yield the remainder of my time to him.

Mr. BOWMAN. Although one of the largest and best equipped navy-yards of the United States is in the district which I have the honor to represent, I trust I shall be able to look at this question moved by no personal prejudices and by no local claims, but wholly in a public spirit. Before making the criticisms which I have to make upon this bill, I desire not only to disclaim any attack upon the distinguished gentleman [Mr. ROBESON] who reported the bill but to offer my tribute of respect to him, and that sympathy which he does not need in regard to any assaults made upon him. He enjoys to-day the title of which he may well be proud—the father of the American Navy; for if it had not been for him and the thirty ships which he set afloat, we should have nothing to-day deserving the name of a Navy. When it was necessary to take responsibility, he took it; he went forward boldly, and those ships were built, which are a credit to him and have been the only credit to the country on the seas, because they have been the only ships afloat that were worthy the name of ships. Whether he has made mistakes or not, he is worthy of the patriotic remembrance and consideration of the country for his services in this respect.

Mr. Chairman, I think that in this bill there are several objectionable features which merit the careful consideration of this House. I said before that the committee are hardly amenable to the charge of having ingrafted legislation upon an appropriation bill, because this seems to be a legislation bill with an appropriation bill ingrafted upon it. It reminds one of Lord Dundreary and his conundrum, "Why does a d-d-dog wag his tail? Because the t-t-tail is smaller than the d-d-dog. If the t-t-tail was larger than the d-d-dog, the t-t-tail would wag the d-d-dog instead of the d-d-dog wagging the t-t-tail." [Laughter.] This bill is in a similar position: the legislative part wags the appropriation part. Throughout it is a legislative bill, embracing new legislation which changes almost all the principles on which the Navy has heretofore been founded or carried on.

I now ask attention, Mr. Chairman, to what I think is a fair statement of the changes contemplated by this bill, or the policy of the bill. It may be considered under four heads:

First. An abandonment of the policy of repair, and leaving all our present vessels to go to destruction.

Second. The abandonment and closing up of one-half, at least, of our navy-yards.

Third. Giving all offices, both of the line and staff, to graduates of the Naval Academy, thus shutting out all civilians from the high offices in the Navy either of honor or profit.

Fourth. The new work contemplated to be done by contractors mostly, rather than in the navy-yards and by the workmen of the Government.

If we are prepared to establish these four general principles in regard to the Navy, then we shall be prepared to pass this appropriation bill, notwithstanding that it has ingrafted upon it these legislative feature, these changes, which properly ought to be made, if at all, by an independent bill.

I think it is not too much to say that it is a most extraordinary thing to have such vital and sweeping changes incorporated by way of legislation upon a mere appropriation bill, and this bill must have the same care and examination and criticism as if it were the bill for the reorganization of the Navy.

It might be interesting, if one had the time, to inquire why the Appropriation Committee should assume to itself the right of not only passing appropriation bills but taking upon itself the duties of other committees and reporting changes of law. "Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed, that he hath grown so great?"

Now, in regard to the first point, the abandonment of the policy of repair and the leaving all our present vessels to go to destruction; if I understand the theory of the committee it is that they wish new vessels to be built, but instead of perhaps frightening the country or alarming Congress by bringing in appropriations for the necessary additional amounts, they propose not to raise materially the appropriations, but to leave the navy-yards and the present vessels to go to ruin, and to use the money ordinarily necessary for their repair and preservation for the construction of new vessels.

During last year about $1,500,000 was used in the construction department alone in the necessary repairs of the vessels in the Navy, and this year it is proposed to allow only $400,000 to be so used. If the new construction scheme passes and becomes a law, I suppose it will be admitted that none of the new iron-clads can be set upon the water in less than a year and a half, or possibly two years, and in the mean while there are vessels, good vessels, vessels as good perhaps as any wooden vessels afloat, which need to be repaired, and for the repairs of which estimates have already been made by the boards of survey.

For example, the board of survey on the Trenton has reported $119,000 as necessary in construction alone. She is at New York and cannot go to sea until the work is done. She is one of the largest and best ships afloat. Shall that vessel be allowed to go to destruction when it only needs a comparatively small part of her cost to be expended in repairs?

The Adams, at Mare Island, is in commission and awaiting repairs, the cost of which is estimated by the board of survey at $17,000. These are repairs absolutely necessary to make her a good vessel. The Kearsarge is at Norfolk in commission, requiring five or six thousand dollars the coming year. The Vandalia, at Kittery, needs repairs amounting probably to $15,000; the Ticonderoga, at New York, about $60,000; the Juniata, at New York, about $10,000; the Omaha, at Kittery, about $40,000; the Ossipee, home from Samana Bay, about $4,000; the Swatara, lately from the East Indies, where she has been for five years, now in commission, about $5,000; the Marion, one of the best ships, I believe, afloat, and built by Secretary Robeson, lately from Brazil, about $60,000; the Monongahela, at California, about $50,000; the Ossipee, of League Island, about $25,000. That was not the Ossipee which I mentioned as home from Samana Bay, and I forget the name of that vessel. The Brooklyn, run down in the harbor of Montevideo, and under repair there, so that the bills must be paid, perhaps $20,000; the Alert, run down in the Chinese waters, about $10,000; the Richmond, under repair in the East Indies, about $5,000.

These I am informed are the correct figures.

Mr. HISCOCK. What is the aggregate?

Mr. BOWMAN. I have not footed up the aggregate.

Mr. ROBESON. Eight hundred thousand.

Mr. BOWMAN. Four hundred thousand dollars is the limit for repairs in this bill in the Construction Department. In the Construction Department alone for necessary repairs last year $1,500,000 were required. The repairs of this year, if they are carried out in the same way, will probably amount to as much as they did last year.

Here we have arrived for the first time, I believe, under an appropriation bill at a fork of the road where we are to decide which of two policies to adopt, and we are to say whether we will take this road and keep our vessels and our yards in reasonable repair, as we have done, or take the other road and course and abandon them and let them go to ruin and expend all our money in building up a new Navy and the construction of new iron-clads. In other words, although iron-clads are better, yet since we have vessels like the Trenton, Kearsarge, Vandalia, Ticonderoga, and others, which are as good as any wooden vessels, why should we not keep them in repair in the same way as we have heretofore done, and raise the money for the new iron-clads and for carrying out the new system of construction in the way which I understand was contemplated by the Naval Committee of this House in their construction bill and by an independent fund, to be raised partly by Congress and partly by selling old and condemned ships of war rotting at the navy-yards and not worth the cost per annum of the watchmen who have to take charge of them?

Now, if we allow these ships to remain as they are and do not carry out the system of repair, in a few years what will be the result? We may have one, two, or three iron-clads, but all our other ships, our cruisers, the vessels which are abroad in the Chinese and European waters and which do for cruising ships, if not available, or rather valuable, in time of war—all of these will have to disappear from the ocean. We will have only a few iron-clads until many years have passed, and then only provided Congress chooses to spend the money in future to build up a fleet of iron-clads. These would all have to be built up to take the place of the present wooden fleet.

Mr. HISCOCK. Has the gentleman any information that $800,000 is not enough for these repairs?

Mr. BOWMAN. I have this information, that the repairs necessary to be made on the ships that I have specified will cost as much during the coming year as the repairs of last year; that as many repairs must be made as during the last year, when $1,500,000 was spent in the construction department. We know that but few ships were repaired during the last year.

Mr. HISCOCK What I wish to know is whether the gentleman has any authority from any one connected with the Navy Department that more than $800,000 can be well spent in the next current year in the direction of repairs?

Mr. BOWMAN. Not being a member of the committee, not therefore receiving any official communications from the Navy Department, I have no authority and I do not pretend to speak by the record; and I only do what I suppose all of us have a right to do, and it is the only thing we can do, namely, bring our judgments to bear on these bills, examine these questions in the best way we can, get what information we can, and submit here to committee and to House whether we are correct or not. I believe, from all the information I can get, that as much money will be needed during the coming year for repairs as during the last. I will ask the gentleman by and by, when he speaks on this question, to show us why there is not as much work to be done on all these and other vessels during the coming year as there was during the past year; and whether he does not contemplate abandoning some of these vessels and putting the money thus saved into this new scheme for the construction of new iron-clads.

Mr. HISCOCK. We do contemplate they shall be tested by the latter provisions of this bill, known as the provisions of the Harris bill. We do propose that vessels upon which repairs are to be made shall be tested by the provisions of that bill.

Mr. BOWMAN. Precisely, but I am informed that we have thirty-seven vessels afloat that are worth keeping afloat, known as first, second, and third rate vessels according to the Navy Register, and for the repairs of these thirty-seven vessels (the money being cut down from the estimate of $1,500,000, for instance, in the Bureau of Construction and Repair, to $400,000, and the working force, or civilian force I believe you call it, cut down one-half in the yards) it will not suffice, and this policy of repairing vessels then must be abandoned under this bill if it be adopted as it is, and that before the two years shall expire when the new iron-clads can be made available the present vessels worth repairing will have reached such a condition that the cost of repairing them will be largely in excess of what it would be at the present time even if they are then in a condition to be repaired at all. In other words, it seems to me the policy is something like that of the man who owns a house which is not quite a new house and perhaps not handsomely finished or as weather-tight or desirable as a house of more modern style, and he says to himself, "although this is a pretty good house; although it is a very comfortable home to live in, and it is in such a condition that I may use it for some purposes or even sell it if I want to, yet I will not put any repairs upon it; I will not change the roof so as to prevent leakage; I will not put in a pane of glass when broken out or a new sill which is rotting away, but I will let the house go to ruin and save the amount of money that I have heretofore put into it in the shape of repairs annually, and with that sum build a new house." Now, that, I say, may be the best policy with reference to the Navy.

I do not pretend to know; but it seems to me that we should, before entering upon that policy, give full consideration to the question as to whether it is the best policy before we adopt it, and that we cannot well give such consideration upon an appropriation bill and in the hurried, closing days of the session.

Mr. ROBESON. Will my friend allow me to make a suggestion to him in this connection?

Mr. BOWMAN. I will be glad to hear the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. ROBESON. The gentleman from Massachusetts is right in his enumeration of the vessels that are worth repairing, with perhaps one or two exceptions; but the question is not whether they shall be allowed to go to pieces, but whether sufficient money shall be spent upon them during the coming year to keep them in good condition, and allow the Navy to go on with building modern iron or steel vessels, or whether these vessels shall be substantially rebuilt, so that at the end of five or six years we would have the same thing to go over again. Now, $400,000 appropriated for the Bureau of Construction and Repair, and $400,000 for steam engineering, making $800,000 in all, gives, on the principle of merely maintaining in their present condition, or perhaps of not permitting them to deteriorate, all that is necessary to keep the ships that are now afloat in order; and I am familiar with them all, for I have either built or rebuilt every one of them, contrary to law, perhaps, but still I did it, and it is too late to impeach me now. [Laughter.]

I am familiar with every one of them, and I think that sum will be enough to keep them in good condition, provided we are going to have the policy of other ships. I merely suggest that to the gentleman from Massachusetts, and the gentleman will understand and pardon me for suggesting it to him, that when you say the Ticonderoga, for instance, will take $60,000 to repair, that $60,000 will not be spent on her during the coming year. Eight hundred thousand dollars on thirty-seven ships will be almost $22,000 on an average for each of them, and many of them will not need more than $5,000 or $10,000 for repairs. That $60,000, if necessary to thoroughly repair her, would therefore run into the next fiscal year.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask if the repairs necessary to be made, unless the principle in regard to construction and repairs shall be changed, will not be as great during the coming year as in the past?

Mr. ROBESON. I think not, because we propose in this bill that no wooden ship shall be repaired when the estimate for her repair is more than 30 per cent. of her original cost; and that will stop the mere putting of money on your wooden ships, which at the end of six years will have to be again rebuilt. But those which are worth repairing, and the gentleman as I have said has named them with considerable accuracy, I think will be and should be kept in reasonable repair.

Mr. BOWMAN. I believe, Mr. Chairman, in the principle or policy of repairing old ships when the cost of the repairs is less than 30 per cent. of the value of the vessel. I think it should be followed up——

Mr. REED. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit me to interrupt him a moment, I would like to suggest to the gentleman from New Jersey that this bill provides for the expenditure of not more than $400,000, which shall be applied to the repairs of any wooden ships; and that none of it shall be applied where the expense of such repair shall exceed 30 per cent. of the appraised value of the same. Now, I understood him to say a moment ago that this referred to 30 per cent. of the original cost.

Mr. ROBESON. No, it refers to the appraised value. That is what I meant. In other words you shall not put on the repairs of any ship more than 30 per cent. of what she is worth at the time the repairs are made.

Mr. BOWMAN. How much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has fifteen minutes remaining.

Mr. BOWMAN. I believe in that principle as stated by the gentleman from New Jersey; but I am informed that for the carrying out of that principle, for the repair of the vessels named, including the incidental expenses, which would come out from that appropriation, like expenses of shops, &c., in the navy-yard, the amount of $400,000 is wholly inadequate. It only needs an account of the expenses at the different yards, which I have here, in the Bureau of Construction and Repair during the past two years, to show that you cannot accomplish in that department, for example, for $400,000 what has heretofore cost a million and a half. Until the gentleman can demonstrate that in this year $400,000 will do what a million and a half did last year and the year before, I do not see how his proposition can be demonstrated.

Mr. MORSE. Unless there be a better administration.

Mr. BOWMAN. Unless, as my colleague suggests to me, there is a better administration, which I do not propose to question. Still miracles cannot be performed. Although a multitude might be fed from a few loaves and fishes $1,500,000 cannot be produced out of $400,000. We have a Secretary of the Navy, able, interested in the matter, and energetic, and who, I believe, will be one of the most efficient Secretaries whom we ever had, but I doubt if even he can work out that problem to a satisfactory solution.

I have here a statement of the expenses of the Kittery, Boston, New York, League Island, Washington, Norfolk, Pensacola, and Mare Island navy-yards, comprising all the navy-yards, but I will not detain the House by giving the schedule. Suffice it to say that in the years 1880 and 1881, and in the first nine months of the present financial year, not yet expired, the amounts were much larger, very much larger than those appropriated by the present bill. And all I wish to say in regard to this question is, that it does seem to me that the committee ought to report enough money to carry on the repairs under the rules stated by the gentleman, and to keep the ships in good order, or at least from going to ruin.

Mr. MORSE. At least until after the coming election.

Mr. BOWMAN. I believe in a new navy, but I believe the people are willing that we should appropriate the money necessary for starting such new navy, without at the same time indulging in the wasteful policy of letting our present ships go to ruin. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman reporting this bill if it is not true that really this bill contemplates closing up about one-half the navy-yards? The reply is, that that is in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy. Grant it. But do we not know and does the committee not believe that probably one-half of the navy-yards are to be closed up, and is not that the intention at least of the committee?

Mr. MORSE. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOWMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. MORSE. Do you not think that is one of the wisest provisions in the bill, from the fact that for the last ten years none of the yards have been able to employ more than one-half of the time the men they had there? And does my colleague not think it would be better for him and for me, if we were to remain in Congress, to have our yards closed up and no work being done rather than to have the men employed ten days in and ten days out, or five days in and five days out, as may suit the convenience of those in charge, not getting employment more than 25 per cent. of the time?

Mr. BOWMAN. I do think so, if this state of things is to continue and this hardship upon the workmen in the yards is to last, and if under the new construction bill or otherwise work is not to be given to the yards.

This question of the abandonment and closing up of half the navy-yards I want to see met fairly and squarely. I believe under the provisions of this bill it is intended that all the navy-yards shall be closed up except the New York, California, and Norfolk yards; and I am led partly to this belief by finding a coincidence in the sundry civil bill which was reported I believe to-day. I find in the sundry civil bill that by a coincidence, although repairs were asked for in the Charlestown yard and other places, the committee have only made an appropriation for expenses in the New York, California, and Norfolk yards. Although there is a comparatively small fund for repairs for general purposes at the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, $60,000 was asked for necessary work and a caisson at the dry-dock in Charlestown, and that was not granted.

Mr. HISCOCK. May I interrupt the gentleman to ask him a question?

Mr. BOWMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is the gentleman in favor of appropriating $605,000 to support the navy-yards and to keep them open when we have not work to be done in them?

Mr. BOWMAN. I am in favor of the committee and this Congress doing one of two things; meeting this question fairly and squarely, as was proposed by my colleague [Mr. MORSE] in his bill, and as has been proposed in a bill concerning the New York navy-yard, and deciding in Congress whether navy-yards shall be kept or not, and what navy-yards are necessary, and what navy-yards should be sold, or appointing a commission to investigate and report upon all the facts of this complicated question.

I am not in favor of keeping the navy-yards and keeping them closed. If we want them, use them; if we do not want them, sell them. This half-way policy of keeping a yard, and keeping it closed or partly closed—sometimes work, sometimes none—keeping all the workmen in suspense and a ferment, so that they do not know what to look forward to or what to anticipate, is provocative of endless trouble, and my colleague [Mr. MORSE] has well referred to the evils of such uncertainty. I am not in favor of keeping this question, whether a certain navy-yard shall be run or not, any longer dangling between heaven and earth. I am not in favor of keeping a navy-yard in existence and allowing the people to suppose it is to remain, and holding out to employés hopes of work in the future, when it is intended to be always an empty yard, with no work, and of no use to workman or merchant or to city; and to keep the yard there only in name, when it shall be of no earthly use to any one; of keeping the yard in a place where it is utterly useless, and not used for navy-yard purposes, so that no merchants can use it, no railroads can use it, no private individuals can purchase it, and when it has no taxable value for the benefit of the city or the State. It is there useless and worthless, waste and valueless property to every one, blocking the way for merchant vessels and commerce, and only injuring the population, which has grown up in the habit of being dependent on the navy-yards for work.

For example, a practical question is presented which is well worth examining. The navy-yard at Charlestown, for example, has caused to grow up a population which has gone through an apprenticeship, or otherwise learned a trade, of skilled workmen, such, for example, as boat-builders, ship-builders, &c., in which occupations they can at present find no employment outside of the navy-yard. What can a boat-builder or a shipwright do when thrown out of employment there? You say of the line officer, having educated him at Annapolis, that it is wrong to turn him out when he has learned no business but that honorable one to which he has devoted his life.

But after you have had the shipwright taught in your navy-yard, and he has become dependent upon it with his family, you tell him this yard is to be stopped and sold, and that he must go somewhere else; or the Secretary says he must suspend this yard for a while, and so you keep him dangling along, and give him the idea it is to be opened again, thus holding always before him the delusive hope that he will in time find work in the closed yard by waiting for it. It is a delusion and a snare to close up the yard. It is better to dispose of it, and to have certainty for uncertainty, and that all should know just what to expect.

I believe the leading yards should not be closed or sold, but I have no time to go into that question now. To say nothing of your having trained up skilled workmen, and having held out hopes of work and employment to them, and of the injustice and inhumanity (never practiced upon the favored graduates of West Point and Annapolis) of turning them out upon the world, if this is done, this body of skilled and ingenious workmen will scatter and be lost, the tools and plant will be destroyed, skill will vanish, no new generation of apprentices is coming forward; the artisan, mechanic, expert, the tools, the experience, all are gone, and when the sudden exigency of war arises you have no skilled workmen or tools, and you are helpless. You are destroying your reserve force by abolition of the navy-yards.

But if it is deemed best to do away with some of the yards, as it may somewhere be, let a commission be appointed to gather facts and statistics as to all of them, their value, fitness for their purposes, location, value for defense to the country, demand for the location for mercantile purposes, and see by a broad survey of the whole question which of the yards can best be spared. They should not be temporarily closed or permanently sold by any hap-hazard, guessing operation like this.

This never ought to be done by this Congress. This matter ought never to be left in such a shape as under this bill, when the struggle would commence before the Secretary of the Navy on the part of the friends of each navy-yard, who would bring all the pressure they could to bear on him to keep their particular navy-yards open, and thus the whole land, so far as the navy-yard States are concerned, would be kept in commotion.

Why not settle the matter now in the way I have proposed? If you do not need all these navy-yards, then why not propose a commission, as once suggested by my colleague, though he did not introduce the resolution which he was to introduce—but I hope he will—why not appoint a commission to report at the next Congress what navy-yards shall be sold, and thus settle this question? In the mean time, when there is business for these yards, I submit that this question shall not be decided by political influence, by the men who can bring the most pressure to bear upon the Secretary of the Navy, thus exposing him to infinite trouble and annoyance, but let it be settled after full examination on the ground of which is the best navy-yard and which can be best dispensed with.

I will not refer now, though I may when the time for amendment comes, to the discrimination shown by the Committee on Appropriations, who have put in this bill a provision that the Charlestown navy-yard shall be suspended anyhow, except as a rope-walk. Why not leave that also to the Secretary of the Navy? Why should this best navy-yard in the United States, with a dry-dock that cost more than a million of dollars, with the best machine-shops and ship-houses, with all the facilities required in a navy-yard—why should the Secretary be told in advance that this one yard in Massachusetts shall be selected and closed under this act, and the other yards kept open?

Mr. MORSE. Because your district is all right anyhow.

Mr. BOWMAN. Possibly; but Sam Slick said "doubtful things are always uncertain." How much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. BOWMAN. I wish I had more time, for there are two other points upon which I wish to speak, and more at length than I can do in five minutes. I want to speak of the provision confining the selection of the officers of the line and staff to graduates of the Naval Academy. I think a superficial examination of this subject will convince the House that in that respect this bill is wrong.

Heretofore the staff offices have been open to civilians. What hope do you hold out now to a man in the Army or the Navy? Talk about the aristocracy of Russian or other European armies or navies! Why, sir, you are establishing a more exclusive aristocracy than these in the Navy. Your ships go up and down the Mississippi River and around to the Atlantic cities enlisting boys from the schools or the streets, telling them they can learn to be good seamen and can have all the advantages of "a life on the ocean wave," and the protection of the Government.

You then tell that boy that no matter how gallant and brave he may be, no matter how he may spend his nights in study, no matter if he shall become the best seaman in the United States, and the best expert in nautical knowledge, he never can rise to the rank even of a staff officer in the Navy; that unless he shall have had the advantage of graduating from the Naval Academy he can rise just so far and no farther, whatever his merits or his record may be.

It is true that is somewhat so in the Army. But is it right in principle? I recognize the gallant services of our line officers, but I do not believe that when the line officers wish to extend their sphere, knowing how difficult it is to find places for all of them, they should come in and crowd out civilians, these children of the people, who have not had the advantage of being educated at the expense of the Government. One boy has the great privilege of having his food, his clothing, and his education paid for by the United States, and, ergo he is to be protected during his whole life. Yet if I, a poor boy, go to school and pay my own expenses, if I make myself expert, if I pay for all of my food, my clothing, and my education, is it right for the United States Government to go further and say that because I was not cared for by the Government and did not graduate from the Naval Academy, I cannot do as others have heretofore done, become an assistant constructor, or a constructor, or a steam engineer, or even a paymaster in the Army?

Open competition for the best men for these offices, a chance to win them upon merit and by hard work and a good record, a chance to fight his way to the top in those callings, if he has the qualities which fit him for it, this is better, and will produce better results, than the arbitrary rule that these offices shall be filled only by those who graduate from a particular institution.

If I had time I would like to show the statistics on this question. I would like to show you how the United States line officers perhaps need to secure these places in order to find occupation and to show the raison d'etre. I would like to show you how the United States steamship Lancaster in the war, when they were on active duty, had only eleven line officers, and to-day, in time of peace, there are thirty line officers on that vessel. I would like to show how, in time of war, on the Hartford, about the time she sailed up Mobile Bay, there were sixteen line officers, while to-day, when there is nothing to do but cruise, it has twenty-six line officers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DEZENDORF. In what I have to say on this bill I shall speak from entirely unselfish motives. First, because I believe that if any navy-yard at all is to be kept up under the provisions of this bill, the navy-yard at Norfolk, from its situation, location, advantages of climate, &c., must be one of those to be retained.

Second, because as I am unfortunately situated at present, although I have been a life-long Republican who has never supported any other than the national Republican party and its principles, this Republican administration, to whose election I contributed according to the best of my means and my ability, is now using its entire power to crush me. Therefore, whatever I may say to-day I shall say from an entirely unselfish stand-point.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of building up a navy; and per consequence I am opposed to the provisions of this bill. This bill, while pretending to commence the building of a new navy, and pretending to repair the old ships of the Navy, will do neither. I am opposed to it because it is carrying out the "penny-wise and pound-foolish" policy which has heretofore characterized the action of the Democratic party.

In illustration of what I say I have only to point to a ship now laid up in the Norfolk navy-yard, the Canandaigua. When that ship was surveyed five years ago it was estimated that $50,000 would put it in shape to go to sea, to make a cruise. Owing to the policy of which I have spoken, the Navy Department was unable to expend the $50,000 for that purpose. What is the consequence? That ship was put in Rotten Row, and when recently, six months ago, a survey was made it was estimated that it would cost $204,000 to put her in repair, and she has been condemned.

This, Mr. Chairman, is the reason why we have no navy; this is the reason why the Navy of the United States to-day is a by-word and a reproach to this great nation of 50,000,000 people.

Now we are told that we are to have $400,000 appropriated to the Bureau of Construction and Repair for the repairing of the thirty-eight vessels of the Navy. Why, sir, the Trenton, the best ship in the Navy, as good a ship of her class as there is in any navy, will require, according to the estimate of the board of survey, $119,000 in construction alone. When gentlemen get up here and talk about this construction fund of $400,000 and the steam-engineering fund of $400,000 I tell them that I have lived close to a navy-yard for the last eighteen years, and I know the distinction between these two bureaus. Any man who knows any thing at all about the repair of a ship knows that when the board of survey says it will cost $119,000 it means that the cost will be $150,000.

What else? The Bureau of Steam-Engineering estimates that the expenses upon the Trenton—the best vessel in the Navy, as I have said—will be $100,000 for steam-engineering. There is more than one-half of your money gone on a single ship.

Now on account of construction and repairs there was expended last year a million and a half of dollars; but it was not all spent upon construction and repair proper. Five hundred thousand dollars was spent in stores and expenses incident ot the bureau, and $1,078,000 in construction proper during that year. Now, will gentlemen please tell me why and how we are to get along without spending the same amount upon these ships next year? It will be necessary to spend more, because as the ships grow older it costs more to repair them. Let me tell you a fact: I have seen a ship come home to Norfolk, and when she fired a salute I have seen the knees drop out of her. I have seen a ship come home in such a condition that you could take a cane and punch it right through her side. I ask you, members of the House of Representatives, whether it is right to send "hearts of oak" to sea in ships of punk?

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of building up a navy; but I am not for any such bill as this, which means in the shape in which it now stands not only no navy, but no officers. I see in this bill a provision that $1,000,000 may be applied by the Bureau of Steam-Engineering to "building and fitting the turrets and pilot-house of the iron-clad steamer Miantonomoh; to the launching to the best advantage of the iron-clad steamers Monadnock, Puritan, Amphitrite, and Terror."

Why, sir, what has steam-engineering to do with that? The officers of the Steam-Engineering Bureau do not know any more about the launching of a ship than a horse knows about algebra; it is not a part of their business. This $1,000,000 legitimately belongs, by all the customs of the Navy Department, to the Bureau of Construction and Repair.

As I have said, it will be necessary to spend a large portion of this money for materials. You must remember that at the close of the war the navy-yards were full of material. The stock has been drawn upon from that time to this until there is hardly a stick of serviceable timber in any navy-yard of the country; and it will require at least as much money for material next year as it did last year, when there was spent $421,876.88 for material alone.

Mr. Chairman, as I said in the outset, I am in favor of building up a navy. I am in favor of keeping up the repairs upon the thirty-eight ships which we now have. But I undertake to say that under the provision of this bill "that no ship shall be repaired if the repairs cost more than 30 per cent. of its appraised value," not a single ship of the Government can be repaired. What is the appraised value of a man-of-war? How do you determine it? You can get at the appraised value of a merchant ship by ascertaining how many trips she can make, how many cargoes she can carry. But what is the basis upon which to appraise the value of a man-of-war? How are you going to appraise its value? If the committee had said 30 per cent. of the original cost of the ship, then there would have been some basis to have gone on. Then, perhaps, they might have been able to repair some of the ships. I undertake to say, and it is the judgment of some of the best officers in the Navy, that not a single ship in the Navy can be repaired under the provisions of the bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of building up a navy, and I am in favor of building it up in such a way it will do the people of this country some good. I was in favor, and voted in the Naval Committee for the bill to build a new navy and appropriate $10,000,000 therefor.

And I was in favor and advocated, then and there, that those ships should be built in the navy-yards of the country. Why? First, because I thought it was right to distribute this money among the different sections of the country. I did not believe, nor do I believe it is right now to take that $10,000,000 and put it all in New York and Pennsylvania, giving it to contractors. But, sir, I believe part of those ships should be built at Portsmouth, a part at Boston, a part at League Island, a part at Norfolk, a part at Pensacola, and a part at Mare Island, California; and then by completing the iron-clads you would have this money distributed throughout the different sections of the country, and have given the outside contractors a fair share of the work.

When gentlemen ask me if I am in favor of appropriating money to keep up the navy-yards, I say yes, I am in favor of appropriating money to keep up the navy-yards, and I am in favor of appropriating money to put work in those navy-yards. Why should not we do it? I am not afraid of being attacked by the Democratic party for spending money, so it is spent judiciously. Why, sir, their penny-wise and pound-foolish policy has, with other things, kept them out of power for the last twenty years, and I thank God for it; because while I am tabooed by the Administration I am now as good a Republican as I ever was, and I expect to be. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But, sir, the effect of the provisions of this bill, as has been justly said, will be to close up the navy-yards on the Atlantic coast except, perhaps, two, and the navy-yard at Mare Island. I am opposed to that. It does not make any difference to me personally, for the more work they have in Norfolk the worse it will be for me individually. But I am opposed to it, for I think it is unjust to the people and the localities in which these navy-yards are situated. I think that the true policy for the Republican party to pursue is to build a new navy and build it in the navy-yards. For I undertake to say that the work can be done just as cheaply in the navy-yards as it can outside. I know that some gentlemen will look at me and scratch their heads, and say, "Why, the work in the navy-yards has cost more than the work outside." Why, that, sir, is to be attributed to the penny-wise and pound-foolish policy I have been talking about.

They appropriated a small amount of money, and the result was that only that certain amount could be spent during that fiscal year. What then? You will see these men in the navy-yard working ten days or five days a month, or on half time, or one set of men coming in to-day and working on a job and to-morrow going out and another set coming and taking their places. That is the reason why the work in the navy-yards has cost so much more money than outside, if it has cost any more.

If you will appropriate the money to build these ships, and build them in the navy-yards, giving the workmen continuous work, you will find you will not only get your work done as cheaply but a great deal better than it can be done outside.

I have heard gentlemen say it will cost as much to put the plant in the navy-yards to build these new ships as it will to build the ships. Now that is not so. I speak from experience regarding the Norfolk navy-yard. I say that I do know and I assert here to-day that it will not cost over $50,000 to put that yard in shape to build one of the largest of these ships.

Mr. Chairman, there are many other features of this bill I should like to speak about. I think it does great injustice to the old officers of the Navy, to those men who went through fire and blood in defense of the country. Those men who have received the thanks of Congress for their services by this bill are set aside. Those men to whom the faith of this Government was pledged that they should be officers of a certain rank for the balance of their natural lives are by this bill set aside, and I for one do not feel that I can vote to violate any such pledge as that.

There has been a great deal said upon the other side in relation to this bill, and I have been trying to find out under what section of the bill it came in. I do not propose to answer it, or to try to answer it. I think the late Secretary, upon whom the attack was made, is abundantly able to take care of himself. I think that whatever may have been done in the past is past, and that the thing for us to do now is to look to the future, and to start and build up a navy which shall reflect credit upon this great nation of ours. I think that for us longer to delay doing this thing is almost a crime. I believe this country never will be in better condition than it is to-day to start upon this great work, and I for one would be willing to-day to vote for the entire proposition as contained in the report of the naval advisory board, which contemplated an expenditure of $29,000,000 to build up a navy. I say, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that this Government will be in a condition when it can better afford to do that work than it is now.

Mr. MORSE. And it will take six years to use it any way.

Mr. DEZENDORF. Yes, sir; as my friend suggests, you cannot do this thing within six years. But instead of that we find this committee coming in and presenting a bill without consulting the Naval Committee at all, which appropriates, as I said before, only $400,000 for the repair of vessels, and it does not appropriate enough toward building a new ship to lay down her keel hardly. What else? Why there is not a gun in the Navy that is fit to be called a gun, according to the modern definition of that term, and we find they appropriate in this bill the sum of $100,000 for ordnance and $60,000 for torpedoes! Why, gentlemen tell me that we have to depend for our defense upon sand-forts and land-batteries, when they have ships in some foreign countries which carry guns that can send a ball ten miles. Where are your sand-forts then? When they get ten miles outside of the harbor of New York and commence flinging solid shot and hot shot into that place, where will your old forts be?

Mr. REED. Why, we will have to move the sand forts out against them; that is what they meant for us to do. [Laughter.]

Mr. DEZENDORF. Yes, sir; that is about the only way we can get at it. The Committee on Naval Affairs recommend a half million for the purchase of torpedoes, and yet this Committee on Appropriations come in and report $60,000! What is the matter? Have we not the money? Yes, we have the money, and it is believed to be the proper thing to do to purchase torpedoes for the defense of our harbors in the absence of iron-clads. Why not do it? And right here I want to say a word or two upon the iron-clad question. I undertake to say to-day that if there was not a single pound of iron in one of these ships, and you were to commence the construction of iron-clads, that you would adopt the same models that these self-same vessels are built upon, notwithstanding that Mr. Thompson and Secretary Hunt and some other Secretaries have said that they were bad examples of old models.

Why, sir, I would rather take the advice of some old sailor that has had practical experience than all these Secretaries of the Navy. One of them that I heard of once, when he came and looked down into the hold of the ship, showed his acquaintance with naval architecture by exclaiming, "Why bless me, the damned thing's hollow." [Laughter and applause.] That is about as much as a good many of them know about the subject; all their knowledge on the subject is entirely theoretical. But now, sir, what do we find here? We find this advisory board, composed of the very best officers in our Navy, recommending the completion of these iron-clads; that is, they individually recommend them, if not as a board. We find the present Secretary of the Navy—and right here I want to say that I have just as much confidence in his ability and integrity, and I think he knows more about ships than some others did, and I would just as lief take his authority as that of any other man that has ever held the position—says that we ought to complete them. I say that we ought to complete them; in my judgment that is the very thing we should do. I have seen them. I pretend to know a little something about construction, not so much perhaps about ship-building as about some other things, but I was educated as an architect and engineer. I believe these are good ships. I believe they, properly completed, can be made the most serviceable and perhaps the most formidable ships in the world. Now, when they talk about the possibility that they will not float, one of the contractors told me that he would undertake to finish them, and would not ask a single dollar of pay until they were finished, and then if they did not float he would not ask a cent for his work. That is a pretty safe proposition. I believe they ought to be completed, and that they will be all right when they are completed. I believe that we ought to spend a large sum in the construction of iron-clads for our home defenses. I believe in the policy of a nation having the means at hand for its own defense. Why, gentlemen tell me we have no cause to fear any nation coming here to attack us; I say that is all true. For one, I believe we could beat the whole combined armies of the world if they came here.

But, sir, we must provide against contingencies. Go with me to San Francisco. Look at that port, which is entirely defenseless. I undertake to say that the little power, Chili, could come right into San Francisco, levy tribute on its people, burn down the town, and you have nothing in this world to keep them outside that harbor. But if you are going to complete the Miantonomoh at Philadelphia, the Monadnock at San Francisco should be completed. This is the place where there is danger under present circumstances, the place where there may be at any time complications between this Government and a foreign power. I believe, in other words, we ought to do what any other nation would do similarly situated with us. With an overflowing Treasury and with people needing employment it is our duty to go to work and make an appropriation, not such a miserable flimsy thing as this which is brought in here, but a good, solid appropriation for building up a good and efficient navy that will reflect honor and credit on our Government, no matter whom it may meet or where it may go. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. If no other member desires to take part in the general debate the Clerk will commence reading the bill by paragraphs for amendment.

Mr. HATCH. I move that the committee rise if no one desires to speak. I understand that by arrangement general debate is to close at two o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. We might go on and consider part of the bill by sections and then let general debate go on to-morrow.

The CHAIRMAN. As no gentleman rose to address the committee the Chair ordered the Clerk to proceed to read the bill by sections for amendment.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I desire to say a few words.

Mr. HATCH. A good many have left not expecting that the bill would be considered by paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose did the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] rise?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I rose to speak on this bill.

Mr. HATCH. Then I withdraw my motion.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, next addressed the committee, [see Appendix,] but before concluding,

Mr. ATKINS said: As the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS] is about to begin another branch of his argument, and it is now near five o'clock, I would inquire if it would be agreeable to him to yield for the committee to rise.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. ROBESON. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAGE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6616) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ROBESON and Mr. REED moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to submit a resolution for reference to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman who moved that the House adjourn, if it would not be agreeable to take a recess until to-morrow morning at ten o'clock.

Many MEMBERS. Oh, no.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. R. No. 1052) in relation to the Japanese indemnity, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. MORRILL, Mr. FERRY, and Mr. MORGAN.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted on its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. R. No. 4167) to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. ALLISON, Mr. MORRILL, and Mr. BECK.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER ON FORESTRY.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask permission to offer a resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed 20,000 extra copies of the annual report of the Commissioner of Forestry, transmitted to the House in May last by the Commissioner of Agriculture; 13,000 copies for the use of the House, 5,000 for the Senate, and 2,000 for the Commissioner of Forestry.

There being no objection, the resolution was received and referred to the Committee on Printing.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. REED. I will withdraw the motion to adjourn, provided the vote can be taken at once on the motion for a recess.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will move that the House now take a recess until to-morrow morning at ten o'clock.

Mr. McCOOK. Why not make it half past eight at once.

BRIDGES OVER RIVERS IN GEORGIA.

Mr. COOK introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6683) to authorize the construction of bridges over the Ogeechee, Oconee, Ocmulgee, Flint, and Chattahoochee Rivers, in the State of Georgia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

JAPANESE INDEMNITY FUND.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent that the House agree to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1052) relating to the Japanese indemnity fund.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment, as conferees on the part of the House, of Mr. WILLIAMS of Wisconsin, Mr. RICE of Massachusetts, and Mr. DEUSTER.

PAYMENT OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. PEELLE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House the House joint resolution No. 69——

Mr. ATKINS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. PEELLE. I know the gentleman will not insist upon the regular order if he will only wait until I announce the purpose of my motion. It is to call up and act upon at this time a joint resolution to pay the employés of the Government Printing Office for the time which they lost during the obsequies of the late President Garfield. It is a matter of simple justice to them. The joint resolution has been reported unanimously from the Committee on Printing, and at the request of the printers I now ask consent that the joint resolution be considered and passed at this time.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I ask consent to offer an amendment to include the employés under the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 69) authorizing the Public Printer to pay the employés of the Government Printing Office the pay deducted from them during the obsequies of the late President Garfield.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay the employés of the Government Printing Office the pay deducted from them for the time lost during the obsequies of the late President James A. Garfield, during the month of September, 1881.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman how much is involved in this joint resolution?

Mr. PEELLE. All that is involved is payment for six days, during which time these printers were compelled to suspend work. These employés, believing that they were legally entitled to compensation for the time work was so suspended, and that there was no occasion for legislation on the subject by Congress, requested the Public Printer to submit the question to the honorable First Comptroller of the Treasury for his opinion. Accordingly, the Public Printer, on the 30th day of September, 1881, addressed a letter to the First Comptroller of the Treasury Department, submitting for decision the "question whether or not the employés can be paid for the entire time the office was closed on account of the death of the late President, and whether the pay-rolls therefor will be recognized by the Treasury Department."

The Comptroller, in an elaborate opinion, in which he cites many authorities in support of his views, decided that the employés were entitled to pay for the entire time the office was closed, or work suspended, except for the 26th day of September, which was designated by the President for observance throughout the United States as a day of humiliation and mourning, being the day on which the remains of the late President were interred at Cleveland, Ohio.

The joint resolution of April 16, 1880, allows compensation for all legal holidays, including days for fast and for thanksgiving, but it was held not to include "a day of humiliation and mourning." The Comptroller held that they could be paid for five of the six days. The Committee on Printing have reported that they should be paid for the whole six days.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then this joint resolution is to pay them for one day?

Mr. PEELLE. It includes six days.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understood the gentleman to say that the accounting officers held that they could be paid for five of the six days.

Mr. PEELLE. So he did; but the Public Printer differed from the First Comptroller, and they have not been paid for any of those days.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, of which I have the honor to be the chairman, have considered very carefully and agreed to a proposition to pay the day laborers under the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, who were compelled by order to give up work during these obsequies. They are as much entitled to their pay as are the employés of the Government Printing Office. It will involve not more than $200, and will give rise to no discussion. I ask consent to offer it as an amendment to this joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, District of Columbia, is also authorized to pay the employés under his charge the pay deducted from them during the same time.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PEELLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I move to amend the title by adding the words "and for other purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

MONUMENTAL COLUMN, BATTLE OF MONMOUTH.

Mr. ROSS. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table for present consideration Senate bill No. 188, which I think will elicit no objection, and will occupy but a moment.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. No. 188) in regard to a monumental column to commemorate the battle of Monmouth.

Whereas an association by the name of "The Monmouth Battle Monument Association," incorporated by the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, secured by grant a portion of the battle-field of Monmouth for the purpose of erecting a monument thereon, which land is now held in trust for such object; and

Whereas under a law of said State, passed March 14, 1881, a commission has been appointed to erect a monument thereon and improve the grounds; and

Whereas the sum of $20,000 has been raised or secured toward erecting such monument and caring therefor, and improving the grounds where it will stand; and

Whereas the sum of $20,000 is inadequate to erect a monument befitting the historic significance of the event it is designed to commemorate and the present greatness of the nation: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $20,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended by said commission in erecting and completing on the battle-field of Monmouth a suitable monument, the money to be paid to the commission aforesaid under the direction of the Secretary of War: Provided, however, That the said Monmouth Battle Monument Association and the said commission shall have raised, to be expended in the erection of said monument and in the improvement of the site, at least the sum of $20,000: And provided further, That the design for the said monument shall be approved by the Secretary of War; and the sum herein appropriated shall not be available until a contract is made to complete the work within that sum.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

Mr. ROSS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS] prefers to resume his remarks tomorrow morning at eleven o'clock. Therefore I will not press the motion for a recess.

Mr. ROBESON. I move that the House adjourn.

SETTLERS ON INDIAN RESERVATION, NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of the Interior of the 22d instant, with accompanying papers, submitting the draft of a clause for insertion in one of the pending appropriation bills to provide for the payment for improvements made by certain settlers on the Jicarilla Apache Indian reservation, in New Mexico. The subject is presented for the consideration of Congress.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. JONES, of New Jersey, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. BROWNE, for two days, on account of public business.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. ROBESON, that the House adjourn, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

The following petitions and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 29, 1882.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. VOORHEES presented two petitions of delegates to the convention held in Saint Louis, in October last, in the interest of the improvement of the Mississippi River, praying for the adoption of a certain plan for the improvement of that river; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HAWLEY presented the memorial of the American Baptist Home Mission Society, setting forth the unhappy condition of the Indians under the past and present management of the Government, favoring appropriations for bettering their condition, and praying that their lands be given to them in severalty and be made inalienable for twenty years; also that they may be made citizens of the United States, and that the Indian Territory be constituted a State; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PENDLETON. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to report a bill on a subject committed to them by the action of the Senate, and I ask that it be read twice and put upon the Calendar.

I desire to say in the hearing of the Senate that this is a bill intended to correct as far as possible the imperfections of the law as it exists relating to the administration of civil and criminal law in the consular courts in the Levant and the eastern countries. There has been a very instructive report printed at this session of the Senate by its order, being Miscellaneous Document No. 80, to which I wish to call also the attention of the Senate, in order that when I call up the bill, as I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to do, Senators may be advised as to its contents and be prepared to take action upon the bill. It is a subject that I am certain will commend itself to the judgment of Senators, and it is very important that action should be had at this session.

The bill (S. No. 2107) to provide for the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred upon the United States in places out of their territory and dominion, and to repeal the Revised Statutes from section 4082 to section 4130, inclusive, was read twice by its title.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 2202) donating condemned cannon and cannonballs to the Soldiers' Monument Association of Birmingham, Connecticut;

A bill (H. R. No. 3082) granting condemned cannon to the Anna M. Ross Post No. 94 of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Philadelphia;

A bill (H. R. No. 3278) to authorize the Secretary of War to loan tents to the Northwestern Missouri and Southwestern Iowa Veteran Soldiers' Association; and

A bill (H. R. No. 6004) making an appropriation to construct a road and approaches from Mound City, Illinois, to the national military cemetery, and for other purposes.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PENDLETON asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2108) for the relief of Samuel Paxton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2109) for the relief of Robert Clarke & Co.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOAR. I ask leave to introduce a bill for the erection of a public building at Haverhill, Massachusetts. I desire to say to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds that this is a city of more than twenty-two thousand inhabitants, and is growing very rapidly, and has a very large postal business. The city has been visited since the beginning of the present session of Congress with a very disastrous fire, eating out its whole business center, and the construction of a modest and reasonable post-office building would be a great assistance to the people in their calamity. A bill to that effect, introduced on conference between myself and the Representative from that district, was reported in the House of Representatives some weeks ago, but in order that its consideration may be hastened in the Senate I desire to introduce it here. I ask my honorable friend from New Hampshire, [Mr. ROLLINS,] who knows the locality very well, it being quite near his own home, to be kind enough to give the bill proper attention in committee, as I am sure he will.

Mr. ROLLINS. The committee will give the subject early attention. The facts stated by the Senator from Massachusetts are within my own personal knowledge.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 2110) for the erection of a public building at Haverhill, Massachusetts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. VOORHEES asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2111) to compensate John W. Smith for losses sustained by him during the war of the rebellion; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2112) granting a pension to Lewis L. Cannaday; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONGER asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2113) to correct the record of William S. Johnson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DISTRICT COLORED-SCHOOL LOTS.

Mr. DAWES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be directed to obtain and communicate to the Senate a statement of all lands or lots of ground in Washington and Georgetown that have been given or purchased for the use of colored schools; first, those which have been given by the General Government, if any, or any benevolent institutions, and second, those which have been purchased for their use by trustees, with the names of the trustees who purchased each piece or parcel and the amount paid for each, with the date of the purchase, designating the location of each lot.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business? The Chair hears no response, and the morning hour is declared closed.

Mr. ALLISON. I move then to proceed to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the Senator will allow me to call up the resolution in reference to labor strikes. It will not take long probably to dispose of it.

Mr. ALLISON. It is absolutely essential that the pending appropriation bill should be disposed of to-day.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senator from Iowa will allow me a minute to call up a bill that was up the other day, and which I think will pass in a moment of time.

Mr. ALLISON. If there is to be no debate upon it——

Mr. SHERMAN. I called it up the other day——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has the floor, if the Senator from Iowa yields it.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from Alabama has the floor, that ends it, of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair states that the Senator from Iowa has the floor on the motion to take up the appropriation bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator from Alabama that I very much desire to finish the legislative appropriation bill to-day, but of course I do not want to interfere with current morning business that will take no time. If the Senator from Alabama thinks his project will take no time, of course I shall not interfere with him.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not think it will, but I cannot say. I prefer to yield to the Senator from Iowa if he will go right on with the appropriation bill and not yield to anybody else; but I do not want to yield the floor to have it thrown into the hands of other Senators.

Mr. SHERMAN. I want to have a little bill passed that is a matter of some importance. I trust the Senator from Alabama will allow me to have a bill passed which is pressed upon me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. I will yield to the Senator from Ohio if the Senator from Alabama will allow me to do so, if the bill he wishes to have considered takes no time.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no control of the business of the Senate or of the Senator either. I have yielded to the Senator from Iowa with the understanding that he will go on with the appropriation bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I will yield to the Senator from Ohio, but not for anything that will occupy time.

INSPECTION OF HULLS AND BOILERS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senate to take up House bill No. 3831. I am assured that there is necessity for establishing an inspection of hulls and boilers on the Ohio River. It is a matter of local importance.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I wish to say that when the bill was up before, at my instance, it went over, but I have since examined it, and think it ought to pass.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3831) to create a district for the inspection of hulls and boilers of steam-vessels. It proposes to create, for the inspection of hulls and boilers of steam-vessels, a local board of inspectors to be located at Gallipolis, Ohio, in which there shall be one inspector of hulls and one inspector of boilers, one of whom shall be transferred from the office of the local board of inspectors at Cincinnati, Ohio, and one from the office of the local board of inspectors at Wheeling, West Virginia, each of whom shall receive per annum the same compensation he may be receiving at the time of the passage of the act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1052) relating to the Japanese indemnity fund, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. C. G. WILLIAMS of Wisconsin, Mr. W. W. RICE of Massachusetts, and Mr. PETER V. DEUSTER of Wisconsin the conferees on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House insisted on its disagreement to certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4167) to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. W. W. CRAPO of Massachusetts, Mr. N. DINGLEY, jr., of Maine, and Mr. A. H. BUCKNER of Missouri the conferees on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 1432) abolishing the military reservation of Fort Abercrombie, in the State of Minnesota, and authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to have the lands embraced therein made subject to homestead and pre-emption entry and sale the same as other public lands, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 188) in regard to a monumental column to commemorate the battle of Monmouth.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 3207) giving the assent of Congress to the mayor and city council of Nashville, Tennessee, to construct a free bridge over the Cumberland River;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 69) authorizing the Public Printer to pay the employés of the Government Printing Office the pay deducted from them during the obsequies of the late President Garfield, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 248) to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the Senator from Iowa to allow me to bring up the bill (S. No. 2090) to further regulate the investment of the Pacific Railroad sinking fund, which was reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALLISON. I cannot yield this morning. I want to finish this bill. After this bill is completed there will be a little time when we can pass bills of that kind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6244) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] which will be read.

The PRINCIPAL LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of line 2392, in the clause making appropriations for the "office of the Director of the Geological Survey," it is proposed to insert:

And no salary or compensation, except such as may be paid under the law to the Director of the Geological Survey, shall be paid or allowed to any person connected with the work of said survey to an amount exceeding $3,000 per annum.

Mr. HALE. I have examined the subject-matter touched by my amendment, and have concluded that it is wiser, instead of presenting it in this form, to withdraw it for the present. With the consent of the Senate I will withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn. The reading of the bill will be continued.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 2406.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] announced last evening that he desired to submit an amendment to line 2405, increasing the salary of the surveyor-general of the Territory of Dakota from $2,000 to $2,500; but he is not in the Chamber.

The reports of the decisions of said Supreme Court shall hereafter be printed at the Government Printing Office, under the supervision of the reporter, and sold by the Public Printer at cost of publication with 10 per cent. in addition thereto.

Mr. BECK. That amendment was not a unanimous report of the committee. We can have the amendment of the committee acted upon now, or I will wait until any time that is desired, reserving it. Perhaps it had as well be acted upon now. I was inclined to agree with the action of the House, and mainly for the reason set forth in the report made by Mr. TOWNSHEND from the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives on the 29th of March, which states all the reasons quite as well as I could state them. I ask the Secretary to read that report. It covers a page and a half of print, and will save my saying anything. I object to striking out that portion of the bill as it came from the House of Representatives.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

Mr. TOWNSHEND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report, (to accompany bill H. R. No. 5539:)

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred bills H. R. Nos. 1279 and 1849, submit the following report:

Under the present law the reporter of the United States Supreme Court receives $4,000 annually from the national Treasury by way of salary when he issues two volumes of the reports yearly, and in addition thereto he receives such profit or royalty on each copy sold as is provided in his contract with the publishers. The reports are now published by Little, Brown & Co., of Boston, for the reporter, under terms of which the committee has no knowledge. These reports were published and sold at $5 and $6 per volume, until something over one year ago, when the price was reduced by the publishers to $3. This reduction was undoubtedly occasioned by the passage in the House during the last Congress of a bill similar to those which are now under consideration. Yet, for the 300 copies which are furnished to the Secretary of the Interior by the reporter, the Government pays at the rate of $5 per copy.

This committee is advised that if the contract for publishing the reports was open to public bidding, and the reporter confined for his remuneration to a fixed salary to be paid by the Government, that these reports could be profitably published and sold at from $1.50 to $2 per volume, in paper, type, presswork, binding, and style not inferior to the reports known as "Otto's Reports."

Indeed a responsible law-publishing firm has stated to members of this committee that if the emoluments of the reporter are limited to a fixed salary, to be paid from the national Treasury, it would take the contract to publish the reports, in paper, type, presswork, and style not inferior to Otto's Reports, furnish 300 copies to the Interior Department gratuitously, and obligate itself to furnish all the reports called for by any person at $2 per volume.

The price at which the reports of the different States are now published warrants the belief that the Federal reports can be furnished at the price last mentioned, and a good profit realized by the publisher.

From this statement it will be seen that under the present law the public is compelled to pay an unreasonable price for the reports.

Your committee is of the opinion that a reasonable salary should be fixed for the reporter, and that he should be limited to such salary for compensation. The system which allows him a copyright on the reports for which he prepares head-notes, and the power to levy such royalty upon them as he may demand, is open to abuse and injustice to those who are compelled to purchase these reports.

The Public Printer has furnished your committee with estimates of the cost of the different volumes of Otto's Reports, if they had been issued at the public printing establishment. A table of these estimates is attached hereto and made a part of this report, from which it will be seen that if the thirteen volumes of Otto's Reports had been published by the Public Printer the cost of each would have been as follows:

Volumes.	Estimated cost of first edition of 2,000 copies.	Estimated cost of second edition, each additional 1,000.	Volumes.	Estimated cost of first edition of 2,000 copies.	Estimated cost of second edition, each additional 1,000.
No. 1	$2 75	$0 88	No. 8	$2 54	$0 84
No. 2	2 86	0 90	No. 9	2 86	0 90
No. 3	2 64	0 86	No. 10	2 76	0 88
No. 4	2 96	0 92	No. 11	3 03	0 94
No. 5	2 87	0 90	No. 12	2 77	0 89
No. 6	2 76	0 88	No. 13	3 05	0 96
No. 7	2 72	0 87

or at an average cost of $2.81 for each copy of the first edition of 2,000 copies, and eighty-nine cents for each copy of the second edition of 1,000 copies.

The committee has been unable to ascertain the number of copies of the reports that are now printed. When the attorney of the present publishers was before the committee opposing the passage of this bill, he declined to furnish this information, although he was invited to do so. But considering the number issued by the publishers of Wallace's Reports, who were the predecessors of the present publishers, the committee is of the opinion that more than 3,000 copies of each volume are issued and sold.

These reports should be placed within the reach of the public at the lowest price without incurring additional expense to the Government, and the committee therefore recommend that a plan similar to that in force for printing and disposing of the Revised Statutes should be adopted; that the size of the volumes, the paper, type, presswork, binding, and style be not inferior to those of the reports known as Otto's, and that they should be supplied to persons who may desire to purchase them at a price not exceeding 10 per cent. in addition to the cost of printing and binding said reports; and in order to prevent speculators from buying up the editions and forcing the public to pay an unreasonable price for them, we recommend that no person shall be permitted to purchase said reports for resale unless he shall give bond as provided in the bill accompanying this report.

It is believed than an annual salary of $4,000 where the reports of the decisions shall constitute one volume, and an additional sum of $500 where more than one volume is printed and published per year, is a reasonable compensation for the services of the reporter, as his privilege to engage in the practice of law is in no wise restricted.

The committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill, which is a substitute for bills H. R. Nos. 1279 and 1849.

Mr. BECK. These are the reasons assigned by the House committee for fixing the salary of the reporter at $5,000 a year, and printing the reports at the Government Printing Office. I thought the reasons were good, and therefore was unable to agree with the committee in striking out the clause.

Mr. GARLAND. The amendment of the Committee on Appropriations to this bill is an amendment that the Committee on the Judiciary recommended favorably to the consideration of that committee and reported here and had referred to them. This amendment, if Senators will observe it, simply keeps the matter of the publication of the reports of the Supreme Court just where it is now under the law.

It has been deemed best by the Committee on the Judiciary in considering this matter that the publication of the reports of the highest court in the land should be kept directly and strictly under the hands of the reporter, with his responsibility attached to it, and not be put out as ordinary work to the highest bidder, or placed in the Government Printing Office, as is the provision in the bill from the House. I am satisfied that if any Senator will examine the reports published by Otto, he will see that those reports are by far the best in their make-up, better than other issues, both as to the material used and the way and manner they are put up, and better as to reporting the cases properly and reporting the arguments of counsel.

I do not believe that any reporter in his work heretofore has compared with Judge Otto in the make-up of his reports, and the reporters of that court have been distinguished jurists, such as Wheaton, Cranch, Black, and others.

The report just read by the Secretary, made in the House in reference to this matter, speaks of the comparative cost of different reports. Let me call the attention of the Senate directly, as a matter of contrast, to two volumes that I have in may hand. I have here the last of the Otto Reports, the thirteenth volume, and the last volume of the Court of Claims Reports, the sixteenth volume. The volume of Otto that I hold in my hand compares with any reports, whether published in this country or England, or elsewhere, that I have ever seen. It is a volume of nine hundred and four pages. That volume is sold at $3. Here is the last volume of the reports of the Court of Claims, which is disposed of under the programme designated by the provision in the bill as it came from the House. Is it fair to say that you can compare this book with the volume of Otto? You can contrast it, and it is a contrast in every particular.

This book contains six hundred and ninety-eight pages and you pay $5 for it. You pay $3 for the volume of Otto of nine hundred and four pages. You pay $5 for the smaller book—you can see for yourselves how it is got up—and $3 for the volume of Otto.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. But the Senator knows very well that perhaps ten times as many of the Otto Reports are sold as there are of the reports of the Court of Claims.

Mr. GARLAND. Very well. That does not affect the particular question here. The report which the Senator from Kentucky has had read seeks to contrast the different reports that are sold in the markets with Otto's. I invite the comparison; I invite the contrast.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator what the Public Printer asks for the reports of the Court of Claims? What is the cost to the Public Printer?

Mr. GARLAND. That I am not aware of. I am not informed upon that point, but the price we pay for this volume when we buy it is $5.

Mr. FRYE. Has the Senator forgotten that the price we paid for Otto was $5 or $6 until the last year?

Mr. GARLAND. It is only $3 now.

Mr. FRYE. But it became $3 under the threat of the bill which passed the House in the last Congress. It never was $3 before that.

Mr. GARLAND. It may be the effect of a threat, perhaps.

Mr. FRYE. It was $5 to the Interior Department for the three hundred copies furnished them last year.

Mr. GARLAND. It is now sold at $3 a volume. The report of the House committee attempts to compare other volumes. I have a statement here which I shall have read directly, taking the reports of all States and Territories to be compared with what Judge Otto gets.

The Senate must bear in mind another thing, that the reporter furnishes his own stationery and his own office room, and gets nothing from the Government except simply his pay for this business, and out of that he defrays all the expenses, and under the rules of the Supreme Court he is prohibited from practicing law, and he is one of the best lawyers, as I am told by the persons who know him perfectly well, in this country; and when it is summed up, all told, he does not get exceeding the sum of $6,000, out of which he must defray all the expenses of stationery, clerical assistance, and so on.

This matter was before the Judiciary Committee two years ago. That committee reported adversely to this proceeding of changing the law on this subject, and I beg leave to have its report read in full to the Senate, and that is all I care to say in addition to what I have said.

The Acting Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, from the Committee on the Judiciary, May 24, 1880:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1493) entitled "An act defining the duties of the reporter of the Supreme Court of the United States, fixing his compensation, and providing for the publishing and distributing of said reports," have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

The provisions of the existing law, which the bill repeals, require the reporter to print and publish the decisions, and to deliver, within a specified time, three hundred copies of each volume of his reports to the Secretary of the Interior. He is entitled, for his services and the delivery of that number of copies, to an annual salary of $2,500, when his report of the decisions in any one year constitutes but one volume.

If by direction of the court he prints and publishes more than one volume in any one year he is entitled to an additional compensation of $1,500.

This has been, in its essential features, our legislation on the subject since the act of March 3, 1817, (3 Statutes at Large, 376.) The reporter then received from the Treasury $1,000, and furnished the Government eighty copies of each volume of his reports. No more were then required for distribution to the judges and other public officers entitled to receive them, and such was the limited number of cases on the calendar that those decided at each term could be embraced in a single volume. The act was a temporary one, expiring by its own limitation three years thereafter. It was continued in force, however, by the acts of May 15, 1820, March 3, 1823, and subsequent acts. By the act of August 29, 1842, the reporter received an increased compensation, but was required to furnish an additional number of copies, the act providing for their distribution to certain designated public officers, increasing the number to be delivered for the use of each House of Congress, and providing that the residue should be deposited in the Library of Congress. The acts of July 23, 1866, and March 2, 1867, contain the provisions embodied in the existing law. (See sections 681, 682, 683, Revised Statutes.)

The bill under consideration provides that the reports shall be printed by the Public Printer, who, after delivering 300 copies to the Department of the Interior, is to sell the remainder to the public "at a price not exceeding 10 per cent. in addition to the cost of printing and binding" them, and one section provides that no person shall be permitted to purchase them for resale until he shall give a bond in the penal sum of $1,000, to be approved by the judge of any United States court, with good security, that he will not sell the same at a greater price than the cost of printing and binding, with 25 per cent. added.

The object of our legislation upon this subject has hitherto been, and should continue to be, to insure at the smallest charge to the Treasury the authoritative publication of the decisions of our court of last resort in a substantial and becoming form, at a price not exceeding that of other law works of the same size and quality. The mechanical execution of "Otto's Reports" is equaled by few publications in this country or in England, and is excelled by none. The work is eminently satisfactory to the court and profession, and in point of paper, type, and press-work is a great improvement upon the reports of any of his predecessors. The price of the volumes to be hereafter published will be $3 each, and in view of the style of the work, the number of pages, and its general excellence, is lower than that of any similar work. A table of the prices of the reports of the several States and of the circuit courts of the United States, which is believed to be entirely accurate, is appended hereto and establishes this fact:

Comparison of Otto's Reports with other reports by proportion of size and price.

* This table was prepared in June, 1879, and six volumes of Otto were then published, the last six volumes of other sets were taken as a basis of comparison. The price of Otto's Reports, as here given, is that which is to be charged from the present volume, (Otto, vol. 10, or United States Supreme Court Reports, vol. 100.)

† Wallace was published at $6, and afterward at $5, per volume. Separate volumes are now sold at the latter price. A set of 23 volumes is sold for $69; and this, the lowest wholesale price, is the one here taken for comparison.

‡ This is five cents cheaper per volume than Otto's Reports; but comparison will show that the latter are printed on much better paper and are better bound than the Illinois Reports.

It has been urged in some quarters that should the bill under consideration become a law the members of the legal profession might be able to purchase the work at a lower price. If that result should be accomplished, it would furnish no justification for imposing, as the bill does, an additional burden on the Treasury. It provides the same salary as that to which the reporter is now entitled, should he publish two volumes a year, and by the existing statute the Government receives, in that event, 600 copies a year without paying therefor. But there is no reason to suppose that the profession at large can purchase the volumes for less than $3 each, to which the publishers have now permanently reduced them, as will be seen by the letters hereto appended.

No specific price is named in the bill, and the required bond of the purchaser to whom the volumes are sold by the Public Printer, to prevent the sale at a higher profit than 25 per cent. of the original cost, if it really amounts to anything, will not prove an effectual limitation upon the price of the volumes in the hands of the retail bookseller who resides outside of the city of Washington and its immediate vicinity. The proposed measure will rather tend to enhance their price and diminish their circulation, while it is the interest of the present publishers to extend it as widely as possible. The Court of Claims Reports, now printed at the Government Printing Office, are sold at the law bookstore in this city at $5 per volume, and in point of execution are in every respect inferior to "Otto's Reports."

The reporter is not furnished by the Government with office accommodations, clerical assistance, or stationery. These necessary expenses must be borne by himself. At the time of the appointment of the present incumbent a rule of the court was adopted forbidding the reporter to practice at its bar, and he is expected to give his undivided attention to the arduous duties of his office, the efficient performance of which requires an accomplished lawyer and scholar. No other is qualified to fill acceptably an office which has been adorned by the learning and culture of Dallas, Wheaton, Black, and other distinguished members of the profession. For such services the salary provided by the bill is, in view of the expenses to which the reporter is unavoidably subject, grossly inadequate, far less than the nature of the duties should command, or that of any bureau officer of the Government, and less than that realized by the reporters in many of the States. Were there no other objections to the bill, this, in the opinion of the committee, is an insuperable objection, one which can only be obviated by imposing an additional burden upon the public Treasury, which should, if practicable, be avoided.

Regarding the subject in all its aspects the committee is of opinion that the proposed change in the existing law is inexpedient, and they recommend the indefinite postponement of the bill.

WASHINGTON CITY, January 12, 1880.

MY DEAR SIR: Inclosed I send you the letter of Messrs. Little, Brown & Co. to me. Please read it and hand it to Mr. Thurman, to be submitted to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate.

Very respectfully, yours,

NATHAN CLIFFORD.

Hon DAVID DAVIS, United States Senate.

LITTLE, BROWN & COMPANY,
254 Washington street, Boston, January 10, 1880.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your recent inquiry, we beg to inform you that we will meet the wishes of the court and bar by reducing the price of the United States Supreme Court Reports, commencing with volume 100, to $3 a volume.

Hoping this will prove entirely satisfactory,

We are, yours, very respectfully,

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.

Hon. NATHAN CLIFFORD.

Mr. BECK. For the current year the salary of the reporter of the decisions of the Supreme Court is $2,500 and what he can make out of the books he prints, and no one knows what that is. The House committee say that when the attorney for the publishers was before the committee opposing the passage of the bill he declined to furnish the information as to the number of copies of the reports printed, although he was invited to do so. The policy, I think, is generally to pay public officers a fixed salary, instead of having a contingency out of which they can make something.

Mr. HOAR. Did not the reporter, Mr. Otto, furnish that information?

Mr. BECK. Mr. TOWNSHEND, from the Committee on the Judiciary of the House, made a report in which he makes the statement I have made.

Mr. HOAR. I thought the Senator certainly would not question Mr. Otto's statement that he furnished the information.

Mr. BECK. I read this:

When the attorney of the present publishers was before the committee opposing the passage of this bill he declined to furnish this information, although he was invited to do so.

That was all I said, and I read it from the report.

Mr. HOAR. I am sure the Senator did not understand me, because I think if he did he would not leave off quite there. The Senator read from the House report, which I presume is true, that the attorney before the committee, on being invited to furnish certain information, did not furnish it; whether he had it to furnish is not said. The practical question here is whether the information was furnished or withheld. It was furnished by Mr. Otto, the reporter.

Mr. BECK. I judge from the report of the House committee that they were unable to get it. This is the whole sentence, and the Senator from Massachusetts will understand it quite as well as I do:

The committee has been unable to ascertain the number of copies of the reports that are now printed.

They assert their inability, and I suppose that comprehends all sources of information. Then they use the language which I read a moment ago, and proceed:

But considering the number issued by the publishers of Wallace's Reports, who were the predecessors of the present publishers, the committee is of the opinion that more than 3,000 copies of each volume are issued and sold.

The reason I said I was in favor of the House provision was, first, because it was well to pay public officers of the United States a fixed salary for their work. I have no doubt that Mr. Otto is a man of ability; I have no doubt that he is required to give his whole time to the preparation of this work, and the Senator from Arkansas says he has done it well. I believe he will continue to do it well, and can afford to do it well for $5,000 a year, and there will be no falling off in the character of his work because we see fit to pay him $5,000 a year for that work instead of giving him the chance of what he may make at the price he can sell the reports for.

The district judges of the United States are men of ability, very many of them at any rate; they have to give their whole time and attention to the duties of their office; they cannot practice law; and yet they are content with $3,500 a year salary, in many cases, and they are usually quite the equals of Judge Otto in ability, and certainly they have more labor to perform. I do not think that the reporter of the Supreme Court will complain, when the district judges of the United States have to work from one end of the year to the other deciding all sorts of important questions, that he is badly treated when he is allowed $5,000 a year for his services as reporter of the Supreme Court, and the character of his work will be just as good when the change is made as it is now.

I am advised by gentlemen who have consulted with Mr. Morrison and other booksellers that $2 apiece will be the price of these books if they are published in the way proposed by the House.

Mr. MAXEY. Does not the Senator know that the opinion of the Supreme Court is against this change?

Mr. BECK. I take it for granted the Supreme Court will stand by its reporter getting all he can. Every one of the judges, I have no doubt, is opposed to the change.

Mr. MAXEY. The Supreme Court think the best thing to be done for the bar of the country is to let the matter remain as it is.

Mr. BECK. The best thing to be done for the bar of the country is to give them as good a report for $2 as they are now paying $3 for, and for which they paid $5 until last year. It does not require a judge of the Supreme Court to answer that question. If every lawyer in America who has to use the decisions of the Supreme Court—and they are coming to be used more every day—can buy the same book for $2 that he now pays $3 for, that is his interest, and all the judges of the Supreme Court might decide otherwise, but nobody would believe them. The House report says:

> For the three hundred copies which are furnished to the Secretary of the Interior by the reporter the Government pays at the rate of $5 per copy.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Is the Senator sure that the result will be what he states?

Mr. BECK. That was the information the House had. That is the information that members of the committee who consulted with booksellers here affirm, and I believe the Senator from Missouri was one of them.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question at some convenient time? If I understand him he suggests that probably three thousand volumes are sold.

Mr. BECK. That is what the House committee say.

Mr. HOAR. He proposes to give them to the profession at $2 instead of $3 a volume. That is a saving of $3,000 to the bar of the country. Now, to create that saving you put $2,500 on to the Government for the additional salary of the reporter. That is to say $2,500 of it we pay for the benefit of the bar, out of the Treasury; and then in addition do we not give up the six hundred or three hundred copies in the case of the single volume a year, which we now get for nothing for the Government? Thus the Government would be really spending $4,000 or $5,000, to say nothing of the judgment of the court as to the deterioration of the value of the work, and to say nothing of the probability that the price will run up as that of the Court of Claims Reports has done. Thus we shall be spending several thousand dollars more than we save to the bar. What is the answer to that suggestion?

Mr. FRYE. Does the Senator understand that we get 600 volumes for nothing?

Mr. HOAR. Three hundred of each volume; that is, 600 a year.

Mr. FRYE. I do not so understand. I understand we paid $5 a copy last year.

Mr. HOAR. The reporter has to furnish 300 copies to the Government gratuitously, as I understand.

Mr. FRYE. I do not so understand it.

Mr. HOAR. That is so. You will find it in the report.

Mr. BECK. I have said about all I care to say on this question.

Mr. HOAR. May I restate this proposition for a moment, and if I am wrong in any particular the Chair or the Senator from Kentucky will correct me.

Mr. BECK. I will yield the floor altogether in a minute.

Mr. HOAR. I thought the Senator had finished.

Mr. BECK. No.

Mr. HOAR. I beg pardon.

Mr. BECK. I was remarking that I had said about all I desired to say on this subject. The Senator from Texas asked me about the opinion of the Supreme Court in regard to this, and I answered in the way I did. I have had many difficulties in regard to matters connected with the Supreme Court, the highest body in the land, of course; but if the Senator from Texas will inquire, I think he will find that each one of its judges has now a messenger or some one that waits upon him, and I have been unable to find any law or any appropriation for it, or where the money comes from to pay those men who are waiting on the members of that court. I am very anxious to ascertain about that, not that I object to their having such service; but I want to know the law whereby the appropriation is made and how it is obtained. That court takes as good care of itself as any other body, but it seems to be provided for in ways that I do not understand. So I am not looking to them particularly for information where to retrench expenditures or to furnish facilities or to do anything to cut down perquisites.

Mr. MAXEY. If the Senator will allow me, what I said about the judges of the Supreme Court was simply that they had better information on this subject than anybody else.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, this whole case can be stated in a nutshell, and I would like to have the attention of the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Maine, and see if in any respect I am in error, because I want to be corrected if I am.

The reporter at present gets $2,500 a year salary. If he publishes two volumes in the year he gets an additional $1,500. That makes $4,000. Then he gets a certain percentage on the sales, which never comes up, as he says—and nobody will question his words—to quite $6,000 a year. Out of that $6,000 he has got to pay office rent; he has got to have the entire services of a capable clerk, whom he pays for himself, and pay for his own stationery. He is being written to by lawyers all over the country to know whether the Supreme Court have decided this, that, or the other matter affecting an interest under their charge, and he has to write an ample explanation of what the court have decided. Certainly he will not have more than about $4,500 or $4,700 a year left to him. There has to be given to the Government out of the publication 300 copies of each volume. If there is one volume published in the year the Government gets 300; if there are two volumes published the Government gets 600. What does the Government pay? It pays, taking one volume a year alone, $2,500 a year, and that is all on the present system, unless there are two volumes, in which case it is $1,500 more; but I am taking it on the one-volume theory.

Now suppose, as the Senator from Kentucky thinks, under this new provision the bar get the volume for $2 where they are now getting it for $3, and there are 3,000 volumes sold. The lawyers all over this country have saved $3,000, that is a dollar apiece on 3,000 volumes; but the Government has paid out $2,500 of that $3,000 in the added salary of the reporter. It has lost its 300 copies of the reports, which, being worth $2 apiece, amounts to $600, making $100 more than the entire saving. That is the statistical view.

That being the fact, the Supreme Court unanimously and the Judiciary Committee unanimously, and the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, not unanimously but by a majority, agreed that the present system is the best, and why? Because we have tried the other system in the Court of Claims, and in the first place we get very much inferior work in type and execution in our vast Government Printing Office than we do if we have printers selected especially for their skill in publishing law-books. In the next place you will not save this money to the profession throughout the States, and why not? If you buy a book at cost to the Government Printing Office you have got to order it in advance, and that is a way nobody does. What member of the Senate or what lawyer who has a friend a member of the Senate will send to the Government Printing Office a year beforehand and deposit $3 by a postal order and have it there, paying in advance for this book? He will buy it of the next bookseller, and the result will be that somebody will buy up as many as he chooses to order in advance.

Mr. Morrison, or somebody else here, will order the books from the Government Printing Office on speculation, and he will resell to the booksellers throughout the country at a certain moderate increase, as the bill provides he shall, and he is to be under bond too, but the booksellers throughout the country will tack on to that price whatever they can get for the book in their neighborhood. That is the way it works in the case of the Court of Claims Reports, which, while they are published under this system at cost, are sold and retailed throughout the country at $5 a volume, so that you have added a considerable sum to the annual expenditures of the Government, and you have added also a considerable sum to the cost of the book to the profession, and you have diminished very largely its quality. That is the whole story.

Mr. BECK. I rely upon the report of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House that the 300 copies furnished the Secretary of the Interior by the reporter were paid for by the Government at $5 a volume, and if the system is changed those 300 copies will be furnished at $2 a volume. There is $3 that the Government makes to add to the present salary, and that is an easy way of getting it, and it brings it to within a few dollars. There is the Revised Statutes [exhibiting the volume] printed at the Government Printing Office and furnished at $2.80—three times the size of a volume of Otto's Reports.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to settle a question of fact? I suppose it is not quite proper to appeal to the Presiding Officer of the body when he sits in the chair, but as he made the report that has been read and a particular fact is stated in the first sentence of it, may I be permitted by the Senate to ask the Chair whether there is any doubt that these 300 copies are now furnished gratis by the reporter?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reporter furnishes 300 copies.

Mr. HOAR. Of each volume?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of each volume, free of expense to the Government, and there have been issued two volumes every year for eight or ten years.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I am opposed to the system of paying our public officers for public service by emoluments. I shall be glad to get rid of that system on any occasion that is presented. I think it would be better if the circuit court clerks and district court clerks of the United States were paid salaries instead of fees, and so of the marshals; but in respect of the reporter of the Supreme Court, I think there can be no doubt that it is a very much better system for him and for the people to pay him a salary and have no emoluments attached to that office.

There is another feature of the law, which I had never observed before this morning, and at which I must confess my surprise, and that is a copyright on the reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. I take it for granted that that copyright has the sanction of the court; otherwise they would not permit it to be put in the book in every volume that is issued. The reporter of the Supreme Court of the United States has no more right to a copyright upon those decisions or upon his statement of the cases than the Secretary of State has upon the compilation of the Statutes of the United States which he has to publish under existing laws. The decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States are the supreme law of the land, and stand in every respect upon the footing of the statutes. Every professional man in the United States ought to have access, at least, to a copy of these reports. I do not see how a lawyer can afford to hold himself out as being a proper and competent adviser to his clients unless he has some means, at least, of access to the supreme law of the land. We are blocked out by our former system of an opportunity to many of the profession in the United States of having access to the Supreme Court Reports. Whatever shall cheapen these reports, and place them most largely in access to the people and the bar, is the best policy, and it is our duty, it seems to me, to resort to that plan whenever we can do it. If we can put these reports, decently printed from the Government Printing Office, in the hands of lawyers of the United States at $2 a volume, it seems to me there can be no question that it is our duty to do so, and I would rather give to Mr. Otto a salary of $10,000 a year than cut off the bar of the United States from the opportunity of having these reports printed cheaply and having them circulated largely in their midst. I would take off this copyright, for instance, and allow any publisher to print these reports who chooses to do so. Then we shall find men coming into competition with the Government on this question, and these reports, instead of being $2 a volume, perhaps will be $1.50 or $1.60, and be then circulated, and there can be no doubt that while the system proposed by the House of Representatives is in some respects imperfect, it is a better system than the one we have got from our own committee. I hope, therefore, that the report of the committee will not be concurred in, but that the action of the House will be allowed to stand, that these reports may be circulated through the country at as low a rate as the Government can possibly afford to put them at.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I do not thoroughly understand this whole case; but so far as I have gone into it, it is my general impression that we shall obtain no advantage by throwing this work into the hands of the Public Printer. That office is now immensely overburdened. It is quite possible that if we put this work there in addition we may be a year, a year and a half, or two years, or two years and a half in getting these reports.

It will be difficult for lawyers throughout the country to get them unless they send their orders in advance under the law as it stands, and if we provide that the Public Printer shall print a certain supply in advance we shall probably soon find that he has on hand $50,000, $100,000, $150,000, or $200,000 worth of back volumes, and we shall be embarrassed by it. We shall add to his force and to his duties without in my opinion any corresponding advantage.

This volume furnished at $3 by Little, Brown & Co. is very handsomely printed, on very handsome paper, and excellently bound. It is a very creditable specimen of work. I do not believe that anything as well done as that ought to be furnished by the Government or anybody else at less than $3. In my opinion, if we give it to the profession generally at $2.75, $2.50, or $2.25, we shall be supplying the profession at the expense of the Government. The book is worth $3 a volume as it lies here now on the table.

I think if the present system is satisfactory to the bar, if they get the reports promptly printed and promptly delivered at $3 a volume, it is better to "let well enough alone."

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, this seems to be a simple question between the reporter and his publishers and the public, and the point for the Senate to determine is whether they will legislate in favor of an old right which has remained with the reporter for a great many years, with a salary of $2,500 a year, and all the profits he can make out of the legal profession of the United States added to it, or not.

The sale of the law reports of the United States, both under the General Government and in the States, has been one of the greatest wrongs upon the profession and upon the people that has existed in the whole country. It is but a few years ago since every court report of every State cost $5 a volume. Now you can get the same work for between $1 and $2, the same size, better bound and better printed.

The whole professional fraternity and all who desired to know what the law of the United States was, both in its statutes and in the decisions of the Supreme Court, up to last year were compelled to pay $5 a volume for all these reports. What was the consequence? Good lawyers all over this country were compelled to go and buy up old digests to get a little smattering idea of what the courts had decided. The libraries of the country are full of them, without law, without decisions, without authority. It has been a burden intolerable upon the profession; and every man here who is a lawyer, unless he lives in the immediate neighborhood of the booksellers or unless he had wealth to buy these reports, knows with what trouble he could gather together, all over the Western country at least, by hook and crook and by economy and care, even a few of the reports of Supreme Court of the United States giving the decisions on the law of the land.

I am one of those who think that the opinion of members of the Supreme Court on this matter of trade and barter by their reporter is not the best opinion for the profession generally throughout the country. I think it is not best for the reporter of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States to be placed in a position where he buys and sells and peddles the law of the land at a price to suit himself and to increase his salary. It is neither dignified nor honorable. I make that assertion without fear of contradiction from anybody. It is not dignified or honorable for the United States to place in the hands of the reporter of the decisions of the august tribunal for which he reports the temptation to increase prices, to decrease prices, to peddle the decisions of that court among the profession over this broad land. I think a better time has come and is coming from this fact: in the last Congress the House of Representatives adopted and passed the same provision which is in this bill, but, unfortunately, this conservative Senate, following the usages for years, struck it out; but—and I call the attention of the Senate to it—that warning itself in an inchoate bill on a mere amendment, which was rejected, brought down the price of the Supreme Court reports from $5 to $3 a volume; and for one year, without law, by the mere force of the threat of that amendment, the publishers and the reporter have sold the reports for $3 a volume to purchasers throughout the country, although they charge $5 to the United States. That is an auspicious beginning. If this provision of the House bill even fails in the Senate, it will bring down the price half a dollar, perhaps, to the professional men throughout the country.

Now, sir, the men who endeavor to learn the law and be the interpreters of the law throughout the whole extent of this land, the young men entering the profession and trying to obtain a knowledge of the law of the land and the decisions of the courts which are the exponents of the law of the land, are not rich; they are not inheritors of fortunes; they are not lawyers by descent and inheritance. Thank God, the door to the legal profession is open to the poorest boy in the land, to his energy, to his enterprise, to his acquirement of learning, and he goes into it in nine cases out of ten with debts lying upon him for the very education that enables him to carry on his profession.

I say in nine cases out of ten in this land that is so; and he is met here by a usage grown up from the beginning, which compels him to pay $5 for a book which can be printed and bound and furnished to him, as the report of the Public Printer shows, just as good as it is now, and abundantly good for his purpose, for $2, and even less; ay, as the report and estimate of the Public Printer shows, on the second edition of 1,000 and on the third edition they can be furnished for less than $1, and 10 per cent. added, as provided by law. They can be furnished cheaply at $1.50. Why should the profession of this country pay $5 or $3, or any sum whatever, to aggrandize an officer of the Government? Why not let the Secretary of State charge for the publication and printing of the consular reports or the diplomatic correspondence? Why not let any officer of the Government, who is paid a salary to perform his duty, barter and peddle with those who want the documents he issues all over this country? It is not dignified, it is wrong in principle.

Now, sir, I think the provision of the House bill which was inserted a year ago, and two years ago, although it did not then become a law, has done more for the people of the United States in bringing to their doors the laws of the land and the decisions of the Supreme Court thereon than any other measure which has been passed in Congress for years. At one swoop, even the shadow of the forthcoming law struck down the price of these reports two-fifths; they are sold for that except to the Government now. If this officer has a salary let him do his work; do not put a copyright and the profits of a copyright upon the laws of the land. Every man is expected to know the law; and yet you fix a price on that knowledge beyond the means of nineteen-twentieths of the people of the United States.

Whether the Senate adopt this provision of the House bill or not, I hope the opposition to striking it out will be so strong that the advance be made so much upon the old system that at least it will be a warning to the publishers and to the reporter of these decisions that they must continue to diminish the price and stop expecting exorbitant rewards for the privileges of an officer of the Government.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I think it has been repeated on all hands that the reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court at this time are well made and are well published, are clear, perspicuous, and ably done, and the mechanical execution of the books is acceptable to those who love to look at good books. All that, I believe, is conceded.

Now, here are two books lying before me. One, as the Senator from Arkansas has stated, contains over nine hundred pages; the other, some six hundred pages.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator contrast the Revised Statutes with Otto, and not the Court of Claims reports?

Mr. VOORHEES. I expect you to do that when I get through. I have two law-books here before me; and if there is a lawyer in this body who would not rather give $10 for the Otto with its additional size rather than $5 for this book printed at the Government Printing Office, I should be at a loss to know how to account for his taste.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask the Senator if he has ever seen any of the works published by the Government Printing Office at all equal in execution to that volume of Otto now lying before him?

Mr. VOORHEES. I certainly never did. There is a certain type that stands on all good work in the highest description of books that can never be mistaken, and I never saw such a type of execution on a work emanating from the Government Printing Office. I do not intend to make any assault upon the work done there; but the large mass that is done there has seemed to preclude the possibility of the highest excellence when it comes to books for permanent places in libraries. I have never seen that kind of paper, that kind of type, that kind of mechanical execution that becomes a law library in any work emanating from the Government Printing Office. This book with its binding belongs to a class of itself, and this book that I hold in my hand, 13 Otto, compares favorably with the very best work that is done in England or elsewhere, and that is what we want. That is the kind of work we want on the reports of our decisions of the Supreme Court.

I cannot enter the wide domain of theory with the same success as my distinguished friend from Michigan, but I can look at two books and compare them just as well as anybody of no better opportunities than I have had in life, and when I see this large book of between nine hundred and a thousand pages, so well executed that it is a pleasure to any book man to look at it, selling for $3 to the profession, and this report of the Court of Claims emanating from the Government Printing Office, with not much more than half the matter in it contained in the volume I have just mentioned, selling for $5, I am staggered about the argument that we ought to turn this book over to the Government Printing Office, and I do not feel at liberty to do it. I do not see my way clear; I do not see the benefit to the profession; I only see a deterioration and a degradation of a great work that is now well done.

Mr. President, the position assumed by the Senator from Arkansas and by myself and others is that which has the sanction of the Committee on Appropriations. I am not much wedded to authority, but when I find the Committee on Appropriations agreeing to a proposition, it commends itself somewhat to my mind. Again, when that same proposition receives the indorsement of the Committee on the Judiciary, especially if the subject relates to matters in the hands of that law committee, it acquires additional weight; and then when I learn that the judges of the Supreme Court themselves are in favor of the views which I entertain, it carries great weight to my mind.

The distinguished Senator from Michigan, as I understood him at this distance, seemed to think that the indorsement of the judges of the Supreme Court did not amount to a great deal on a matter of this kind; that their opinion was not worth much more than that of anybody else. Why, Mr President, it is worth anything. If they are men of integrity and men of sense, there is nobody in the world who knows so well as they whether their decisions are acceptably reported. Nobody knows as well as they whether their opinions are presented in a manner entitling them to weight. It is their work that is reported; their mental labors are there put down. I ask the Senator from Michigan whether after he makes one of his able speeches and it is reported to-morrow in the RECORD, I should be as good a judge of the fidelity and accuracy and justness of that report as he would himself be, the author of the speech? I should say not.

Mr. CONGER. I will answer the Senator in one word. I say the profession all over this country want these reports. They do not want the binding nor the beautiful paper; they want the reports. The judges want a beautiful book of course. We all do. That is what I mean. If we can only have for the profession in the United States such a book as we have for all other purposes, printed at the Government Printing Office, good enough for everything else under heaven, the profession can get along with it, even if the judges should desire a little more illuminated form.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Michigan will pardon me if I remind him that I think he assumes to speak for too many people. He says the profession want a cheap book and care nothing about the binding. While he was uttering that a distinguished member of the profession sitting right by me said that the profession wanted the binding and wanted it all in good order. Sir, if I should say that the profession wanted a handsome book well bound, I should have as much authority for my statement as the Senator has for his that they care nothing about the binding and want a mere cheap book, and that only judges of the Supreme Court want a handsome book. I undertake to say that the profession, especially those men who have reached eminence enough to have business before the Supreme Court, want fair, well-executed books, and well bound.

According to the argument of the Senator from Michigan it would do to put out the decisions in pamphlet form, with yellow-back binding, because he could read it, he could understand it just as well in that form as any other. It would be cheap, and pretty soon it would be dirty and wear out; but still we could learn the law in that way. That I undertake to say is not what the profession desire on this subject.

Now, Mr. President, a word more. I know Judge Otto well. I have had that honor since my first entrance into the affairs of life. He is one of the most erudite and accomplished lawyers in the United States, a man of wide and varied learning outside of his profession as well as inside of it. A more honorable, a more upright, a more conscientious man does not live. He is a man of competency and of integrity, and I would take his judgment, in a matter even where he had a personal interest, as binding on me on a subject where his knowledge was so much greater than my own. I have known Judge Otto for thirty years, and such is my estimate of him that whatever he tells me on this subject I would believe, from his matured judgment, and I would act upon it as I would upon my own conviction. I do not believe that he is making one-half, not one-third the amount he could make at his profession. He has been out of the active practice of the profession for some time, and perhaps does not desire to return to it; but Judge Otto is not making $6,000 out of his position as reporter when he pays the expenses, and a lawyer of his high, acknowledged, and commanding ability and acquirements can double and treble that amount any time he proposes to return to the practice of the profession.

I say, Mr. President, it is a privilege to have such a reporter, it is a privilege to have such books; and I hope the Senate will stand by the conclusion reached by the Committee on Appropriations in striking out the House provision, and make the law stand as it has stood for these years past. When a thing is well enough, let it alone.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, there is one view of this subject which I have not heard presented. I have been out a few moments and it may be that it was mentioned in my absence. The proposition is to print this book at the Government Printing Office. It then becomes a public document. It must do one of two things: it must take the course of all public documents, or it must be produced by a separate and independent establishment, separate from the rest of the public documents. If it takes the course of all public documents it must go through the same type with a public document, take the chances of all public documents, and come out as public documents come out.

No law-book is of any value that is not subjected to a much severer test of accuracy than any public document running through any ordinary method of publishing public documents. Law proof-reading is a profession of itself. There are a few law-book publishers who publish for the profession, who have a type altogether different from the type that we have at the Government Printing Office, and who have a system of publishing altogether different, who have a proof-reader who is acquainted with law terms and law references and the manner of referring, and who can see and determine in the proof that which is of infinite value to the profession. All that can be done at the Government Printing Office, but it can only be done by erecting an annex to the present office, separate from all the rest. Otherwise, as I have said, it would come out in that character. And when would it come out? When would the courts obtain it? No man could tell beforehand when to rely upon the publication of these reports.

Then it becomes a public document, going free through the mails like the Agricultural Report; and as the Senator from Michigan says, one great desideratum is for the profession to obtain it as cheaply as possible. The next thing you will find here would be the printing of extra copies, and every Senator and every Representative would have more than one friend in the profession who would feel it a very trifling thing to write to his Representative or his Senator to send him through the mail this document. The temptation will be to multiply extra copies of this print at the public expense, as the temptation has been irresistible thus far to print very costly books to give the Senators and Representatives an opportunity to meet this demand upon them. All this comes simply from the desire to meet the demand which the Senator from Michigan suggests of having a book as cheap as possible for the profession.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Will the Senator allow me to ask him who at this time prints the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. DAWES. I do not know.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Are they not printed by Little & Brown, of Boston?

Mr. DAWES. I do not know. I live a good ways from Boston. I never asked who printed them; I never knew who printed them.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I inquired of the Senator supposing that he would know.

Mr. DAWES. I did not happen to know, so the Senator may have the benefit of my ignorance on that point. I know no more about Little & Brown, in Boston, than my distinguished friend from Wisconsin, nor so much.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Quite likely.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Wisconsin gives daily evidence of his knowing more about the books published by Little & Brown than I do.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That I concede. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. I do not know who publishes the Supreme Court Reports. Very likely they are published by Little & Brown. The Senator has for the first time informed me of that. I pay Little & Brown for the reports of the courts of Massachusetts, and they are printed in a manner that can be relied upon. They do not look very much like a public document. My anxiety, and, so far as I know, the anxiety of the profession for cheap law-books does not lead me to desire to have them printed in pamphlet form, like the document here upon our tables, with no more certainty of accuracy, no more certainty of the time when you can obtain them, and no more certainty as to the cost except to those who can get them for nothing through the mails.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I desire merely to call the attention of the Senate to one or two points in reference to this matter. This question was very thoroughly examined by the Judiciary Committee before the Committee on Appropriations agreed to strike out the provision of the House.

There is one thing I desire to call the attention of Senators to in reference to the House provision. It provides that the decisions of the Supreme Court shall hereafter be printed at the Government Printing Office under the supervision of the reporter, and sold by the Public Printer at the cost of publication with 10 per cent. added. If that provision obtains, we shall find this condition of things: the Public Printer is not restricted in the sale as to the number printed, except under the supervision of the reporter. That means, I presume, merely that the reporter shall see that the books are properly printed. Any person could make application to the Public Printer for these books, no matter who. He is not to be required to furnish them to lawyers, he is not to be required to furnish them to the courts of the country everywhere, but he is to sell them at 10 per cent. advance on the cost of the printing. Any bookseller in this town can do exactly what has been done time and again; that is, take up all the books, or as near all as he can get, and then add to the cost whatever amount he desires, and make a monopoly of it.

If the provision of the House should be agreed to by the Senate, it certainly ought to be changed very materially so as to make some restriction at least to govern the sale of these books. My judgment is that the proposition of the committee to strike out the House provision is exactly what should be done. Why? As to the printing of these books it is immaterial who prints them, whether Little, Brown & Co., or anybody else. I believe that is the name of the firm which has the contract for printing these reports, and they are certainly very well printed. They are sold in the market after being printed at a cheaper rate than the reports that we print ourselves, which are very much inferior to the reports printed by Little, Brown & Co.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Here is the last Wisconsin Report, printed by Callaghan & Company, of Chicago, and sold at $1. Look at it.

Mr. LOGAN. It is a very nice book; there is no question about that. I do not know what the sale of the Wisconsin Reports is, and I did not know the price of the book.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It costs just as much to print the Wisconsin Reports as to print these.

Mr. LOGAN. That may be true. The recommendation of the committee is in accordance with that which has been agreed to and carried out by the reporter of the Supreme Court, indorsed by the Supreme Court, and which has been continued for a number of years until some person, I cannot say who, got an idea that there was a speculation in these books by having a great number of them to sell. I had not heard of any attempt to amend the law in the House until about two years ago.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then the reports were being sold at $5 and $6 a volume.

Mr. LOGAN. Perhaps that is true. Our reports of the Court of Claims to-day are sold down on the street at $5 a volume, purchased by booksellers in the city of Washington from the Public Printing Office under a provision similar to what is proposed here. You pay $5 a volume for them, and they are certainly, as every lawyer who has examined them will say, a very inferior publication, much inferior to the publication of Little, Brown & Co., and yet we are required to pay $5 a volume for them.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator will pardon me for the interruption, but let me ask, is he familiar with the law which authorizes the publication and sale of the Court of Claims Reports?

Mr. LOGAN. I am not.

Mr. COCKRELL. I would thank some Senator who has contrasted the reports of the Court of Claims with the United States Supreme Court Reports to point out the law under which the Court of Claims Reports are published in that way. I should like to see it.

Mr. LOGAN. They are published at the Public Printing Office, and they are sold by the Public Printer. You provide here that the Supreme Court Reports shall be sold by the Public Printer without any restriction whatever. They may not all be sold.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand the statement in regard to the Court of Claims Reports, but I should like to see the law by which the Public Printer has any right to sell them, and by which they are published. Under the general law, when a document is about to be published, anybody can go and subscribe for it at the Public Printing Office and take a certain number, and then he can go into market and sell them at what he pleases; but I should like to see the law which requires the Public Printer to publish the Court of Claims Reports and sell them at any particular price to the public generally after they have been published.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know how that is. This provision, however, is as I say, and I suppose it is similar to the provision in regard to the Court of Claims Reports, that the Public Printer shall print these books and sell them at 10 per cent. advance on the cost of publication. If he were to publish 10,000 volumes he might sell every volume to one book dealer. The whole of the number might be subscribed for by one man, and in that way the price put up as I have suggested.

My own judgment about it is that this publication had better be permitted to remain as it is. The court having had experience in reference to this publication and a knowledge of it, it is in better shape to-day to remain where it is than it would be to change it to the Public Printing Office, and have them employ some person, which would have to be done at Government expense, for the purpose of examining the reports and seeing that they were properly printed.

I have another objection to this provision. There has not been a book printed at the Public Printing Office of any kind whatever or any report which has been printed there but what to some extent becomes a public document. It will be remembered that when the Revised Statutes were printed so many copies were allowed to each Senator and Representative free of cost. They were sent to their friends. Why this was done I do not know, but that is the fact. It became a great annoyance to Senators and Representatives, at least it did to me, because every lawyer in the country wanted a copy of the Revised Statutes, and he would write to a Senator or a member of the House to send it to him.

So it has been with the reports and other documents published at the Public Printing Office, and if you publish the reports of the Supreme Court at the Public Printing Office, within the next twelve months or two years some member of the Senate or House of Representatives who desires to please some constituent will introduce a resolution giving so many copies for distribution to each Senator and Representative. That has always been the case, and that will follow just as sure as the provision is retained in the bill.

There is but one other thing which I desire to say, and it is in the same line with what the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] said, that it is important to the lawyers of the country and the judges of the courts that they shall obtain these reports, and when they obtain them, that they shall know certainly that they are correct. I have not time to turn to it, nor do I desire to do so, but I will merely mention the fact that the supplement to the Revised Statutes, which was printed at the Public Printing Office, and I do not say this by way of criticism on the Public Printers, for they are generally very correct, but you will find two pages in that supplement to the Revised Statutes that do not belong there, which got in there by accident at the Public Printing Office, and five hundred copies of that book, which were recently ordered, have been printed and sent out with the mistake of two pages in the book. So you find the same condition of things in reference to one of our publications here.

The reason for that is because sometimes the Public Printing Office has such a large amount of matter on hand that they have to hurry it and rush it through, and in that way mistakes are made. It is impossible to prevent mistakes occurring in that way. So, if we desire to have these reports printed absolutely true and correct, and at a reasonable price, my judgment is that it is better to leave the matter where it is than to change it.

So far as the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] in reference to the copyright of this book is concerned, I find that a report made by a gentleman at the other end of the Capitol states that to be a fact. It is very simple to remedy that. There is no reason why that should interfere with the printing of this publication under the supervision of the reporter of the Supreme Court as provided by law. If that is improper (I do not wish to discuss it at the present time) it is very easy to add a provision to the bill now that no copyright shall be given for the Supreme Court Reports. That could be done in a simple line which would not interfere with it in the slightest degree, and I do not know but that would be correct according to the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama. As I said, I do not wish to enter upon a discussion of that now, but the two committees having examined this question, the Supreme Court having examined it, it having been reported on time and again by the Judiciary Committee and by the Appropriation Committee after examination, I think it is not wise for the Senate to disagree with the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, as the question before the Senate is important to the bar, I beg to add a very few words to what has been said.

If I were to express an opinion about the wish of the bar, it would be that they want a book to be good inside and out. I think that would express the exact idea. In a report of the Supreme Court decisions we expect a syllabus, clear, terse, distinct, pointing out the points decided by the Supreme Court. That can only be done by an able man, educated for the profession, and having the qualifications to catch points promptly. We expect a brief statement of the facts, showing the exact facts which were before the court. We expect a brief report of the arguments, in which the reporter is bound to grasp the exact points made on either side. We expect an alphabetical index, giving an abstract of the points made. So much for the inside.

Every lawyer who prides himself in his profession is proud of his library. He wants his books to be properly arranged in such a manner that he can lay his hand on any book on any subject at the moment. These reports we have to take with us to the court-house. They are bandied about in court, as we all know, and they need to be mechanically well executed. Besides, most lawyers who have any large reputation begin to need pretty large print. We expect the print to be clear and large.

The law has given the Supreme Court the appointment of a reporter, with a view of getting a reporter who may make up the inside of the book as the book ought to be made up. Then when any man makes a book it becomes to him a child; he is proud of sending that book out into the world properly clothed. Give the publication of this book to the reporter, and we shall get a better book mechanically executed than it is possible to get from the Public Printing Office, where nobody would take particular charge of the book. That is the point, in my judgment.

From the first all the way down there has been improvement after improvement, for a good portion of the time quite gradual, until we reach the Wallace Reports. There we find the best executed volumes mechanically of any of the reports up to that time, except perhaps the two Blacks. From Wallace, Otto has gone on until we have reached a point as near perfection perhaps as we shall reach in the way of a mechanically executed book, and the inside is equal to the execution of the outside. That book is furnished to the bar at $3.

I have always been willing to let well enough alone. No Government Printing Office or anybody else, in my judgment, can put that book up at a reasonable profit for less than $3. I have heard no complaint from the bar in regard to this matter; the complaint comes simply from competitors. I have heard no member of the bar complaining that he has to pay $3 for such a volume of Otto as the volume which has been on exhibition this morning. It is a fair copy, it is an honest price to the buyer, it is an honest price to the seller.

The system has worked all right from the foundation of the Government to the present time. The book is now as near mechanical perfection as we can expect to get it, and the reporter is a most able man. If there are any perquisites connected with his position they ought to go in to finish out the mere trifle of $2,500 that we give him as the salary of a reporter. Taking into consideration what has been said as to the clear judgment of so many bodies in regard to this matter, it seems to me that we ought to go slowly about this proposed change.

But I heard something bordering upon a taunt as to the views of the Supreme Court upon a question raised in that court. What goes into the Supreme Court Reports ought to be not only their own opinions but a full statement of the facts on which the opinions rest. The reputation of every member of the court is bound up in that. The whole thing is under their control, as their reporter is under their control, and we have the benefit of their judgment about that. However others may differ, I have the highest respect for the opinion of the Supreme Court in a matter of such great concern as that now before us.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Texas if under the bill as it came from the House the reporter is not to supervise the printing of the reports and to prepare the syllabus, even though they are printed at the Government Printing Office?

Mr. MAXEY. I will say in reply that I noticed that also, but as I have before stated, my purpose was to take as little time as possible. I have never yet seen any volume of public documents since the printing of public documents was introduced comparable in mechanical execution with the Wallace Reports or with the Otto Reports. It is true that the bill provides that the reporter may go into the Government Printing Office and supervise the publication; but does he have anything to do with the mechanical work? Although he sees that his brain-work goes in there right, he has nothing to do with the mechanical work.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Texas how it is possible that he should supervise it under the existing arrangements of the Government Printing Office, which is under the control of public officers?

Mr. MAXEY. I think it is impossible. I stated that he could supervise the getting out of his brain work there, but the mechanical work is not under his control. There is a Government Printer under an enormous bond who is responsible to the Government for his work and not to the reporter, and how could the reporter control him? Under the present system, if Little, Brown & Co. publish this book of the reporter, it would be expected and it would be demanded by the bar, as well as by the Supreme Court and the seller, that the publishers should put the book out in a manner as near perfect as possible. I have practiced law a great many years, and I wish again to say that a lawyer loves his library above all things. It may be fancy, but I never saw a good lawyer in my life who did not like to have a good book put up in good style.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee to strike out the provision of the House and reducing the salary of the reporter of the decisions of the Supreme Court from $5,000 to $2,500 a year.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 17.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not a quorum in the Chamber.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask for the yeas and nays. That is the easiest way to secure the presence of a quorum.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. As we are to have the yeas and nays upon this question, I desire to say just one word. We are launching out into a new public document under the guise of printing these law reports. That is number one. We are placing these reports in the hands of the Public Printer, not knowing whether they will come out six months or one year after they are in the hands of the Printer. I have on my table his last report, showing various public documents of great importance, the printing of which was ordered two years ago, that do not yet appear.

Mr. MAXEY. I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the fact that the Agricultural Report is generally over a year behind.

Mr. ALLISON. The Agricultural Report for 1880 has not yet been printed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator explain that? Will he state the reason given before the committee?

Mr. ALLISON. There are various reasons given for it. One was of course that the copy was not furnished in time, but the copy has been in the hands of the Public Printer a long time. The Public Printer is compelled to print the current work of Congress from time to time.

The committee carefully examined this question, and they believe that it is not a wise thing to add this to the enormous amount of public printing already done by the Public Printer. The more I have examined the question the more I am convinced that it is a wise thing for us not to enlarge the printing of the Public Printer. We are spending this very year $2,600,000 for public printing, and the estimate for next year is $3,000,000. Here it is proposed to add to the great amount of public printing the printing of the Supreme Court Reports. I hope it will not be done.

Mr. COCKRELL. I want to say one word. The Senator from Iowa knows that the delay in those publications is because of the appropriations not being made by Congress. The charge is that the publication of these decisions will be delayed. I tell the Senator from Iowa and the Senate that every one of these decisions is first published in the Public Printing Office before it is ever printed anywhere else. Every Senator knows that every one of these decisions is first printed in the Public Printing Office at public expense, and furnished to the judges of the Supreme Court in confidence. Senators talk about the delay that will occur. The decisions are published at public expense, and first furnished in sheet form to the judges of the court.

Mr. GARLAND. Will the Senator from Missouri pretend to say that they are published in the form in which they go into this book?

Mr. COCKRELL. No, sir; but they are printed from type.

Mr. GARLAND. They are printed, but not printed in the form in which they go into this book.

Mr. COCKRELL. That may not be, but they are printed at the Public Printing Office.

Mr. GARLAND. There is no "may not" about it. Here is the form in which they are printed. [Exhibiting.]

Mr. COCKRELL. They are printed in as good form. I have hundreds of them. I know certainly what I am talking about.

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator does not seem to answer the question.

Mr. COCKRELL. Every man knows they are not printed in the form in which they are in the book. I am not saying that they are, but I say, and the Senator knows it, that every decision of the Supreme Court is first set in type in the Public Printing Office at public expense, and it can be set in the same type and form in which it is printed in the book, if it is so desired.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask my friend from Missouri, what is his authority for saying that the decisions are printed at all at the Government Printing Office? Are they not printed by the clerk of the court at his expense? The decisions are printed by the clerk of the court at his expense.

Mr. COCKRELL. Where are they printed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They are printed in town.

Mr. HOAR. They are printed in town, wherever the clerk chooses to get them printed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have always understood that they were printed at the Public Printing Office.

Mr. GARLAND. That is a sad mistake, and I want to correct it. I have here three of these decisions. They are printed by the clerk of the court at his own expense wherever he chooses to have them printed. The Government Printing Office has no more to do with this publication per se than the Queen of England has to-day. I want the Senate to see that the printing of these reports in this form does not facilitate the printing of them in book form one particle, for it might as well be the New Testament that is printed for all practical purposes.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Arkansas, the Senator from Indiana, and several other Senators have taken occasion to hold up before the Senate the Court of Claims Reports at $5 and the Supreme Court Reports at $3. I ask the Senator from Indiana to hold up the Revised Statutes and compare that with the Supreme Court Reports. Two dollars and ninety cents is the Government price for the Revised Statutes.

Mr. HOAR. What is the number printed?

Mr. COCKRELL. I refer to the Revised Statutes of the United States, 1878, second edition. Here is a volume of the Supreme Court Reports. Take them and compare them. One is done at the Public Printing Office and is for sale at $2.80, and the other is sold at $3, printed at private expense.

The bill as it came from the House simply provides that the reporter of the Supreme Court shall have a fixed salary, and he shall make up the reports, and that the reports shall be printed at the public expense under his direction and control, just as they are now printed at a private establishment. There is no difference. The quality will be the same; everything will be the same; the reports will be the same; the same matter will go into each volume. I say the Public Printer will do just as good binding and have just as good paper as the reports now have. If Senators will take the trouble to compare the prices furnished by the Public Printer to the committee of the House they will see that the reports would come even below $2.

Why was it that this monopoly was granted so long to the reporter of the Supreme Court? He got from $5 to $6 per volume for the reports of the Supreme Court until the House of Representatives took the matter in hand and began an investigation. What was the result? Without any legislation coming into law the cost dropped down to $3, and the cost can still be reduced below that.

The question is simply whether we, controlling the publication of these reports, shall permit them to be published and distributed at from $2 to $2.50 or even less than that, or whether we by law shall fix the price upon the publication at $3. That is the only question. The publication can take place at the Public Printing Office just as rapidly and as quickly and as neatly and as perfectly as at any other office in the country.

I hope the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations, which was adopted, I will say, as it has been referred to so often, by a bare majority of that committee, will not be agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES. If the Senator from Missouri made any statement clear and positive it was that the decisions of the court by Otto were printed first by the Government Printer, that they were set in type there. I am authorized to say that the Government Printer has never set the type of one word, line, or page.

Mr. COCKRELL. I made the correction, and stated to the Senate that I was so informed and had been repeatedly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HOAR, (when the name of Mr. DAWES was called.) My colleague [Mr. DAWES] is paired with the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.]

Mr. MORGAN, (when his name was called.) On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 33, nays 22; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will be resumed.

Mr. MORGAN. I have an amendment that I desire to offer at this point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was the agreement that the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations should first be acted upon, and then other amendments would be in order to any part of the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I was going to save time by offering the amendment now; that is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course the Senator has the right to offer an amendment, but the Senate has been proceeding under the idea of acting on the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations and then considering other amendments.

Mr. MORGAN. I shall not interfere with the order of procedure.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 4, line 3, after the word "shall," to strike out "hereafter" and insert "after the 1st day of October next;" so as to read:

That no civil officer, clerk, draughtsman, copyist, messenger, assistant messenger, mechanic, watchman, laborer, or other employé shall, after the 1st day of October next, be employed in any of the Executive Departments, or subordinate bureaus or offices thereof at the seat of Government, except only at such rates and in such numbers respectively as may be specifically appropriated for by Congress for such clerical and other personal services for each fiscal year.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, before the amendments to sections 4 and 5 are acted on, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the extraordinary nature and character of the legislation embraced in those sections of this appropriation bill. We are so much in the habit of passing appropriation bills without care, letting them run along, that oftentimes there is legislation put upon them without exciting the attention of a single Senator.

The legislation contained in sections 4 and 5 of this bill is revolutionary in its character, changing the habit of the Government of the United States from the beginning. It is only the expansion of a system which has grown within the last twenty years so as to change practically the nature of the statutes of the United States.

In the last twenty or thirty years nearly all the legislation of Congress has been embraced in appropriation bills. They have swollen greatly. Thirty or forty years ago there was but one appropriation bill. Afterward there were three or four; now, I believe, there are twelve. Here is one of the appropriation bills containing one hundred and sixteen pages of printed matter. In my judgment, this appropriation bill could be reduced down to ten pages without the slightest difficulty, without interfering in the least with the convenience of legislation, and thus prevent the swelling of these appropriation bills into large volumes.

In my deliberate judgment, and I record it as a matter of criticism which has grown up in time, the object of swelling the appropriation bills is to enable committees of Congress to introduce new legislation in the appropriation bills without having it called to the attention of either House of Congress. In this bill all the way through it there is legislation; there is scarcely a page in the bill but what contains legislation, and new legislation; but the fourth and fifth sections are a substantial revolution in regard to great masses of appropriations. If these sections are adopted, although the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate has changed them somewhat, I venture to predict that within one year from this time loud complaints will come from all departments of the Government, growing out of the provisions contained in this bill, and if the bill is logically carried to its sequence we shall have it swelled next year to at least five hundred pages instead of one hundred and sixteen.

Let us see what is proposed in section 4. The first clause of the section reads:

That no civil officer, clerk, draughtsman, copyist, messenger, assistant messenger, mechanic, watchman, laborer, or other employé, shall hereafter be employed in any of the Executive Departments, or subordinate bureaus or offices thereof at the seat of Government, except only at such rates and in such numbers, respectively, as may be specifically appropriated for by Congress for such clerical and other personal services for each fiscal year.

Suppose that should be made a law; every officer and agent and employé in the Printing Office would have to be named and designated by number, and the rate of compensation, and every officer, agent, and employé in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing would have to be designated, rated, and numbered, in the appropriation bill, and the principle of the section, although not the language, would extend to the designation of the number of employés and workmen on every public building in the United States. This lays the foundation for introducing into an appropriation bill the number, designation, rate of wages, &c., of every custom-house officer, of every inspector, of every employé in the list of one hundred thousand names in your Blue-Book.

In section 5 of the bill I read this provision:

That from and after the 1st day of July, 1882, and of each year thereafter, the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause all unexpended balances of the permanent and indefinite appropriations for collecting the revenue from customs which shall have remained upon the books of the Treasury for two fiscal years to be carried to the surplus fund and covered into the Treasury.

Then follows the clause:

And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to include in his next estimates to Congress, and annually thereafter, a statement specifying in detail the number and class of officers and employés of every grade and nature, with the rate of compensation to each, that may in his judgment be necessary to properly conduct the business of collecting the revenue at each port of entry in the United States, together with an estimate of the amounts required for contingent expenses at each of said ports, and for such additional expenses of the service as cannot be otherwise specifically provided for.

Why is this legislation? Why make estimates in detail for every petty office in the United States scattered through the country? In order that Congress may by specific items make the appropriations for that service. Suppose that instead of confining the bill to the Departments and bureaus of the Government you have this information put in detail in regard to every custom-house and internal-revenue office in the United States; it would swell the appropriation bill largely.

The object no doubt is a good one. Congress never proceeds in a matter of this kind unless there is some plausible reason at hand. The reason is that every item of expenditure should be brought to the attention of Congress. That is no doubt a good idea; but when you undertake to spread all the items annually in large appropriation bills which go into the statutes of the United States you depart from the custom and habit of the Government.

Formerly the items of appropriation for a bureau were contained in a single sentence. I will take any of the Departments; it would say: "For the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the clerks and other officers belonging to that bureau," so much. That would be the only classification. Now the appropriation goes on and sets out every officer, the amount of his salary, the number of clerks in each division and in each bureau, all set out in detail. They are all provided for and regulated by law, the salaries are fixed by law; and what is the use of swelling the appropriation bills to that extent?

I rise now not with a view of making an issue with the committees on this question, but merely for the purpose of entering my prophecy that this system cannot be adopted and put in practice; that you cannot spread upon your statute-book every year the amount appropriated for each officer of the Government. The provisions of this fourth section which repeal all the appropriation acts for particular services will involve you in irretrievable confusion. However, the best way to find that out is by making the experiment.

Take the appropriations made for the Internal-Revenue Bureau. Here is an item of about two million dollars for the collectors and deputy collectors all over the United States. Suppose you should undertake to classify and give the number and designation and character of the officers employed in each internal-revenue district. There are more than a hundred districts; that would swell the bill enormously; and that is proposed by this section. Suppose you set out in this bill the number and designation of officers that would be required at the custom-house in New York; that would swell it enormously. An appropriation is now made for the collection of customs, $3,000,000, or whatever it may be. So an appropriation is now made for the collection of internal revenue, for the payment of collectors and their deputies, $2,000,000, or whatever the sum may be. An appropriation is made for a given object, for the erection of a public building. In the construction of the bill for the building you do not undertake by law to say that there shall be one superintendent, so many draughtsmen, and so many persons of various grades engaged, but you appropriate half a million dollars for the construction of the public building, limiting the amount.

You cannot conduct the business of this Government unless you are willing to trust the executive officers with some of these details, and when you undertake to set out these details in the form of law you defeat the very object you have in view. The object you have in view no doubt is to call the attention of Congress every year to each item of expenditure; but there is no object in printing all the items in detail in your law and repeating them parrot-like year after year, and making your statutes a great volume of laws at every session containing the appropriations of money prescribed by law.

Our English cousins know a great many things that we have not yet found out, and in this respect and in respect to saving in the bulk of laws, they are much wiser than we are. I have here all the general laws passed by Parliament in a single session for a single year, and a very important session. Here is the vote of supply. I will read it for the purpose of showing the method adopted in that old country, where nearly all the contests in Parliament arise upon the question of supply, and more governments change on votes on the supply bill than upon any other. Here is the recital of the act:

An act to apply certain sums out of the consolidated fund to the service of the years ending on the 31st day of March, 1879, 1880, and 1881, and to appropriate the supplies granted in this session of Parliament.

Then it goes on in two pages, and grants so much out of the consolidated fund:

All sums granted by this act and the other act mentioned in schedule (A) annexed to this act out of the said consolidated fund toward making good the supply granted to her majesty, amounting, as appears by the said schedule, in the aggregate to the sum of thirty millions one hundred and seventy-seven thousand one hundred and twenty-nine pounds thirteen shillings and one penny, are appropriated and shall be deemed to have been appropriated as from the date of the passing of the first of the acts mentioned in the said schedule (A) for the purposes and services expressed in schedule (B) annexed hereto.

Here is a schedule in general of these appropriations, covering about ten pages, and that is the whole of the supply bill of Great Britain, where the amount appropriated every year is larger than it is in our Government. But all the details of these appropriations, which are examined also, and upon which the ministry stand or fall, are given in what is called their budget. Here is a volume of the budget, where every officer, every employé, with his rate of wages, the time employed, all the details are given. These do not enter into the statutes, they do not encumber the volumes as is the case with our volumes that now are growing upon us so rapidly. They are published in the budget, they are carefully examined by the committee of supply in the House of Commons; the details are all fixed upon if necessary by a vote in committee of the House of Commons; but they are passed in the form of a general supply bill such as I have read. Here is an amplitude of detail much more full than ours, much more satisfactory, because every body wishing to see what expenditures are being called for can take this book and with all its voluminous details can tell to the last penny what is appropriated by Parliament and what is embraced in the large sum of money appropriated by the general law.

Mr. President, I want to show you the evil of the system in which we have gradually grown, because it has only grown up by slow degrees in the last thirty or forty years. As I said before, formerly, I believe for the first fifty years of our Government, there was a supply bill, in which all the appropriations were grouped together, and then they were classified in general phrase. For instance, according to the old supply bill there would be so much for compensation to the Secretary of the Treasury, two assistant secretaries, so many clerks, so many assistants, so many of the different grades, and all that would be in a few sentences. Here the appropriations for the Treasury Department, which might be included in a small space are spread over many pages, twenty or thirty probably, without the slightest object whatever except parrot-like to repeat what the law now is, that so many clerks shall be in the Fifth Auditor's Office, so many clerks in the Fourth, so many in the Third, and so on. What is the use of repeating that over and over in the law? The danger of it is very manifest.

I ask any Senator if he can tell me from the pages of this appropriation bill what is now the law? Here are appropriations made, for instance, for the First Auditor, $3,000; for deputy auditor, for three chiefs of division, four clerks of class 4, five clerks of class 2, five clerks of class 1, and clerks of different classes, naming the number and giving the amount appropriated to each. Does any Senator here know that that is now the law? Can you say here, from the information you have on the face of the bill, that this is a repetition of existing law? No; you do not know it. You assume, as a matter of course, that the law still stands, but how do you know it? You have not the means of knowing it unless you look at the old laws and find the items there.

If, on the other hand, the bill simply appropriated for the office of the Secretary of the Treasury and for the assistants and clerks authorized by existing law, so many thousands or hundreds of thousands of dollars, then you would know that in that provision for the Treasury Department there has been no increase of the clerical force; but as the bill is now framed you cannot tell.

I see in these pages, as I look over them, from my knowledge of the subject, that there have been increases made. They may have been made in the House by the bill as reported there, because there is no distinction there. No member of the House can tell whether the clerks provided for in the bill as printed are to be new or old. When the bill comes here we cannot tell from the print whether the House have added to or subtracted from the clerks. All the matter is printed in the same type. It is true we can tell by the mode of printing whether the Senate committee propose any change in the bill as it passed the House, but not whether they propose any change of existing law. The result is that neither the Senate nor the House acts with any knowledge whatever as to the changes proposed in existing law unless Senators and members examine carefully the statutes fixing the number and grade of officers in each of the different departments and divisions of the Government of the United States.

I say that the fourth and the fifth sections of this bill are faulty. Suppose an appropriation is made for a given object. An appropriation was made three or four years ago for gathering information in regard to lands belonging to the United States other than the public lands in the United States. Under the laws that then existed the Secretary of the Interior would be able to select a man skilled for that particular business and set him to work to ascertain and find out the nature and character of the title of the United States, the value of the property, &c. But under this provision, by express terms, the head of the Department cannot employ a single soul from a lawyer to a messenger to do anything whatever, however important or necessary, unless the Committee on Appropriations has specifically named that particular person for the office.

That is the effect of section 4; not a single person, clerk, messenger, lawyer, employé of any kind can be employed about the public Departments here unless he is named in the appropriation bill. I say you cannot get along with the Government of the United States in its extended character unless you are willing to trust the executive officers, and, therefore, you ought to appropriate in the first place enough money to carry out existing law, and you need not cover one hundred and twenty pages in doing that, but in a few brief paragraphs you can appropriate what is necessary for each Department to carry into execution existing law, and then if you want to change the law put those changes by themselves, so that we may know and see and act upon them as they are proposed.

Remember, I do not call in question either the motive or the object of this proposition. I know it is the desire of Congress to bring before it and before both Houses in detail all the manifold expenditures of this great Government. That is right. But I say that the mode in which it is being done is not the best mode; that it ought to be done by estimates, columns of figures, which the Committee on Appropriations could take up, as in the British budget, and say that is too much or too little, and go through with it by columns; but there is no occasion to spread all these details every year in the laws which are published at public expense and distributed, but in a few brief phrases, more copious than the English system, because we have a greater variety of expenditure, but still in a few pages you might group all the general expenditures of the Government as provided for by existing law, adding then only such provisions as would be necessary to carry out any new provisions of law you might make.

Here is a clumsy provision which illustrates the nature of this bill. Here are appropriations- and you have made a great number of them this year—for public buildings. All the drafts, all the plans are prepared here; the contracts are made here in the Treasury Department. By the operation of this fourth section not a single employé can be designated to carry those details into effect, except what is contained in a provision that has been inserted to avoid that difficulty. The framers of this bill seem to have considered and found the difficulty in applying their principle to this office. Here is an appropriation for the Supervising Architect in the construction branch of the Treasury building. It goes on naming clerks, and then says:

> And the services of skilled draughtsmen, civil engineers, computers, accountants, modelers, assistants to the photographer, copyists, and such other services as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary, may be employed in the office of the Supervising Architect to carry into effect the various appropriations for public buildings, to be paid for from such appropriations.

Here is an attempt to make an exception to the general rule contained in section 4 of this bill, but it is a most lame and impotent one. That general provision provides that no head of a Department shall appoint anybody, any messenger, any clerk, any employé of any kind whatever, unless he is named and designated by salary and rank and his pay fixed by law; and yet you depart from that principle here to a certain extent when applying it to the public buildings.

So also in the case of the collection of customs. How is it possible to designate the number of officers required to collect the customs in the city of New York? Sometimes they have to be increased, sometimes they have to be greatly diminished; sometimes a superior inspection force must be set at work. It must vary, and that varying must depend on the intelligent co-operation of executive officers. But this bill is framed on the idea that no man can be trusted to perform any duty as an executive officer, no man shall be allowed to designate a clerk, a messenger, unless the pay has been already fixed and prescribed by law.

Why, sir, if you compare the rate of pay allowed by executive order with the rate of pay allowed by Congress, you will find that in all cases, taking all classes of the service, the pay allowed by executive officers is less than that allowed by Congress. Congress allows more pay than any other branch of this Government in all its details, except in the higher grades. You pay your messengers, your watchmen, your laborers, at a higher rate of pay than is paid in any custom-house in the country. The grades are higher for this class of service when fixed by Congress than when fixed by executive officers. You have here endeavored to reduce, by section 3 of this bill, the pay of watchmen and laborers to a certain grade. I think it reduces them in every case.

Mr. ALLISON. Not below existing law.

Mr. SHERMAN. In some cases they are employed in custom-houses and other places where the service may be for only a portion of the year; sometimes they are only employed for two days in a week, sometimes more and sometimes less; but under this general Procrustean law we shall have to pay the men for service when they are not required, simply because the law says that a messenger shall have six hundred and odd dollars a year, and therefore you must pay him when he is not needed.

All these laws are founded upon a narrow jealousy of executive officers. They ought to be held strictly to the performance of their duties; but when you undertake by legislation to regulate them in these petty details, you sometimes defeat the very purpose you have in view.

Without desiring to interfere with this legislation, I now prophesy that this whole experiment of attempting to spread upon the statute-books of the United States every year all the details of our public expenditures must fail. It has already grown to such an abuse that it ought to be corrected, and I earnestly ask the attention of the Committee on Appropriations, which is a very able one, to the necessity of bringing about a reform, a condensation and reduction in the size of these appropriation bills.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Have not these detailed provisions of appropriation for the employés of the Government grown out of the fact that there has not been a wise discretion used where discretion has been extended to some of the heads of Departments? I remember some years ago there was a general appropriation left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury of some $20,000 or $24,000, to be used to aid in the administration of his office. During the administration of the Treasury Department by a former Secretary, instead of giving that to additional employés, there was a complaint that the money was distributed among those already receiving high salaries. I remember hearing such complaints.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It occurs to me that the specific appropriations arose from the abuse of discretion which had been vested in heads of Departments.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt that such abuses are liable to occur, and that is a thing which cannot be avoided. They are more liable to occur under a bill that defines with unnecessary detail the number of employés, &c., because the nature of the service varies from time to time. Sometimes you want more and sometimes less. During the session of Congress all the departments of the Government want more clerical force than at other times. There must be some case, some motion, some reduction of expenditure at times and an increase at others. You cannot keep up a Procrustean organization all the time. The very moment Congress adjourns certain branches of the service are very much reduced. The enormous demands made by your calls for information require probably two hundred clerks in the Treasury Department that may be dispensed with at other times. There must be some give and take.

These remarks are made to the Committee on Appropriations not in any spirit of captiousness, because as I have served on those committees I trust they will not feel that I am criticising their action. There are two reforms that ought to be made at once. In the first place, the bulk of these appropriations ought to be largely reduced. I can take and the Committee on Appropriations can take this bill of one hundred and sixteen pages and reduce it to twenty pages without omitting a single item that is necessary to be entered upon the statute-books.

What is the use, when you are providing for the Fifth Auditor, of naming all the clerks and employés in his office? They are all fixed by law. Why not say: "For the Fifth Auditor and the clerks and employés in his office, so many thousand dollars;" and if anybody wants to know how many there are in that office, let him turn to your Book of Estimates, which is copious and is annually spread before you. So in the Secretary's Office, which contains one hundred and twenty different employés, why not say: "For the Secretary of the Treasury, assistant secretaries and clerks, and employés in his office, so many thousand dollars." You have in a few lines the whole thing. Why spread all the details out over many pages except to conceal changes that may be made from time to time? The two committees of the two Houses may change all the items of your expenditure, may increase the number of clerks in your bureaus, may swell even their salaries, and we are not informed of it, we do not look to it; and to some extent that is done. It is done in this bill. There are several officers added in this bill. I do not call in question the necessity of it, but I say it is done, and persons looking over this bill would not know it. In the ordinary print of the bill, as sent to us by the House of Representatives, there are officers added and officers changed, and no one can find it out; but if there was a simple appropriation made to carry on each bureau or each division of the public service, allowing so much as is necessary, giving the amount exactly, copied from the estimates containing in detail the items of the amount, then you could see at a glance that we were appropriating only to carry into execution existing law. If, then, the law is proposed to be changed, let it be put in as a separate and distinct matter in the bill, so that we can see what is new law and what is old law, what is to carry into execution existing law and what is to carry into execution the new law proposed. In this way all the members of the Senate and the members of the House will be on a footing of equality with the members of the two Committees on Appropriations.

I say that this bill is too bulky, and that by wise supervision it could be reduced; and the Senate can do it as well as the House. The Senate might make upon this bill a model of a bill, if they chose to do it; not at this session, but at the next.

Then, in the next place, we must leave general objects of expenditure in the different Departments more or less to the discretion of the Departments. There may be, as my friend from Delaware says, an abuse of that discretion. Call them to account for that abuse, and it is very easy to detect it. Place in their hands a given sum of money for a given object, and require of them the strictest accountability for the expenditure.

That is the natural way; but when you attempt to limit them and curb them as to their mode and manner of executing the law, you only tie withes around their arms and disable them from doing what is best for the public service.

I do not know that I shall make a contest, but I am opposed to the fourth and fifth sections of this bill as revolutionary in character, injurious to the public service, tending to promote extravagance and waste in public money, and to largely swell the volume of our laws needlessly and uselessly.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio makes a general criticism upon the conduct of the Committee on Appropriations with reference to the details of this bill, and a special criticism with reference to sections 4 and 5. Now, I desire to say one thing in the beginning with regard to these two sections. I regret as much as the Senator from Ohio can regret that legislation is placed upon appropriation bills; and the complaint made by him in that regard is, I think, a just complaint. The Senate Committee on Appropriations, so far as I know, in this bill and in every bill they have presented for the last two years to the Senate, have endeavored as far as they could to keep off legislation, and they have only taken up and considered such questions of legislation as were presented to them by the several bills as they came from the House of Representatives. The legislation complained of by the Senator from Ohio is legislation sent to us by the House of Representatives, and the Committee on Appropriations have endeavored to amend that legislation so as to cure the very evils of which he complains. We know perfectly well that when an appropriation is made for a specific purpose, such as an appropriation for engraving and printing in this city, an appropriation for the erection of the Washington Monument, or an appropriation for public buildings and grounds, in the nature of things labor must be employed that cannot be specifically enumerated in the appropriation bill. Therefore, if the Senator from Ohio will turn to the amendments to the fourth section, he will see that the Committee on Appropriations have, at least, made an honest endeavor—they may have fallen short of success—to cure the evils which we found in this bill when it came to the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate.

Now, why is this fourth section in the bill? It is, as was intimated by the Senator from Delaware, because, from time to time, at least in the judgment of members of the House, and members of this body, abuses have grown up in the several Departments with reference to the compensation of employés not specifically enumerated in any of the appropriation bills. Take, for example, the very illustration given by the Senator from Ohio in the Supervising Architect's office. If you turn to the Book of Estimates you will see a very small number of clerks provided for there, and yet the Supervising Architect, having buildings to construct in all the various States of the Union, has a lump sum from which he can draw. There is an appropriation, for example, for erecting a custom-house in the State of North Carolina or South Carolina; that appropriation is in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury by existing law, and if he chooses to pay $8 a day to a superintendent of that custom-house he can do it; if he chooses to pay $8 a day or $10 a day he can do it.

The object of the fifth section is to amend the budget.

The Senator from Ohio turns properly to the budget presented to the British Parliament. Our budget is in the Book of Estimates. That is intended to be our budget. How is this budget made up? It is made up, as I understand, by the several heads of Departments of the Government presenting to the Secretary of the Treasury at a certain period various details with reference to their respective Departments. These details are supervised by the Secretary of the Treasury, and are sent to us in the Book of Estimates for each year. This Book of Estimates does not contain—that is the trouble—all the expenditures in detail from year to year. There is more detail in the Treasury than in any other Department of this Government, and why? Because, in 1870, under what was known as the Kellogg bill, there was a complete reorganization of the Treasury Department, specifying in detail the heads of divisions, the assistant secretaries, and largely enumerating the clerks by classes; but if you will turn to any other Department of this Government you will find no law at all. I may exaggerate in this, but in my judgment all the law there is for two-thirds of the clerical service in the Departments here is the law contained from year to year in the appropriation bills.

If, therefore, we were to bring in a bill as suggested by the Senator from Ohio, simply appropriating for clerks that exist by law, I do not believe that this Senate could in a month find out how many clerks in any Department of this Government exist according to law, except those enumerated in the Treasury Department in the law passed in 1870. The number of clerks is increased from year to year in all the Departments, and I placed upon the table of every Senator, the day before this bill came up for consideration, every change that we propose in this bill, and in gross the number of clerks in this bill that are not now specifically provided for by law or by previous appropriation bills. So we furnished to the Senate all the information that we could furnish to the Senate in reference to the details of the bill.

Now, if we are to improve the method of forming appropriation bills in the future, it must be done by a complete reorganization of every Department of this Government. You take, for example, the Pension Office; where is the law that fixes the number of clerks in the Pension Office? That law is found nowhere except in appropriation bills, just such as the one pending here. There is no separate and distinct statute fixing the number of clerks in the Pension Bureau.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask my friend from Iowa whether it would not be a wise law for the Pension Office to give to the Secretary of the Interior the power to employ sufficient clerical force to carry the pension laws into execution. I have no doubt that with $100,000, if he was not limited and restrained by your strict regulations, he could employ more clerical force and do more service than with $200,000 appropriated in the way it is done now.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from Ohio asks my individual opinion on that question, I agree with him; but that is an impracticable thing under our system of government.

Mr. PLATT. That is substantially what this bill does. The Commissioner of Pensions has simply said to the Committee on Appropriations just what force he wants to carry on the office, and the Committee on Appropriations have provided the force just as he asked for it. What could be more reasonable than that?

Mr. SHERMAN. But what is the use of putting it upon the statute-book? If you trust the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, why not say "such clerical force as he deems necessary to execute the provisions of the law?"

Mr. ALLISON. We have added in this bill clerical force to the Pension Office alone aggregating, I do not remember now the exact figures, but largely over a million of dollars in cost; and there is no other law, and will be no other law justifying the service of all these clerks and employés except that found in this appropriation bill. If you take the present clerical force of the Pension Bureau, now aggregating nearly eight hundred persons, you will not find a single law upon your statute-books directing their employment except the appropriations of money that are found from year to year in your appropriation bills. Therefore the suggestions made by the Senator from Ohio, although they may have great value, do not apply and cannot be made to apply to the existing state of things in our Government.

The first step in the direction of the reform of which the Senator speaks is to aggregate and concentrate this force in some substantive law, so that the Committee on Appropriations will know from year to year what they are to do, and so that when the several heads of Departments gather up their budget in the form of the Book of Estimates they will have a law before them. Now there is no law. Suppose there are one hundred clerks in the Interior Department, and the Secretary of the Interior wants one hundred and five; in this Book of Estimates he makes an estimate for one hundred clerks, and then for five additional clerks, and says "submitted." There is no law for either, and we go on in this way from year to year embodying in our appropriation bills all there is with reference to the clerical force.

Now a word as to sections 4 and 5 of this bill. I think very likely there will be trouble in the practical enforcement of section 4, and some confusion will arise in the several Departments here in making the change to the system proposed in this bill as compared with the existing system; but I think Senators will be perfectly amazed to find that there are eight hundred and forty clerks in the several Departments at the seat of Government that are not appropriated for at all. The Senator from Ohio says he knows nothing about the details of this bill and cannot know anything about them. It furnishes at least some modicum of information to the Senate as to the number of clerks we appropriate for, but here rest in the discretion of the heads of the Departments at the seat of Government eight hundred and forty clerks that have not been provided for in any appropriation bill hitherto specifically.

Mr. BROWN. How were they paid?

Mr. ALLISON. They were paid out of general appropriations. For example, there is an appropriation to furnish carpets and furniture for the custom-house in the city of Chicago. I find that clerks have been employed in the Treasury Department and paid out of that appropriation. There is an appropriation for purchasing carpets for public buildings outside of the Treasury Department, and there are found upon the books of the Treasury employés paid out of these general appropriations.

The object of the section is to bring into a concentrated form these several employés in order that we may know who they are and what they receive and from what appropriation their services are paid.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If such an appropriation was made as the Senator has referred to for Chicago for the purpose of buying carpets and was specifically directed to that object, is there any warrant of law that can authorize the head of a Department to divert it from that purpose to apply it to another?

Mr. ALLISON. That is a question that I do not care to argue at this moment. The Treasury Department have so construed the laws making appropriations as to enable them to do this thing. They do it because a certain force is necessary here to manage all these appropriations relating to public buildings, and under a construction which they give to these several laws they employ a clerical force for that purpose here in the city of Washington.

So you may take the Bureau of Education, which is another illustration. We have hitherto appropriated $15,000 for gathering statistics with reference to the educational interests of the country; and nearly the whole of that $15,000 was consumed in the payment of clerical force in the Bureau of Education. Now, this bill appropriates in detail for this purpose. So of a number of items that I might name in the bill.

So I think the intent and purpose of the fourth section is in the right direction, as the Senator from Ohio believes. It is in the direction of reform in that it gives to Congress specific knowledge of how the several appropriations are expended. If the Senate Committee on Appropriations have failed to make necessary amendments to bring this fourth section into practical conformity with the existing state of things, then I trust Senators will take the liberty of proposing additional amendments for the same purpose.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I never expected to hear quite such a speech as I have listened to from the Senator from Ohio. I had believed that all men of all parties agreed that it was important, and becoming more and more important, to curtail by exact legislation and by orders from Congress the power and the discretion of the Executive Departments, and to do what was in the power of the representatives of the people to curb them in the expenditure of the public money. And now, when an honest, earnest effort is made, in the face of facts so well known that it is almost unnecessary to repeat them, how are we met? The investigation made by the Committee on Appropriations, embodied, in a volume of perhaps 2,500 pages, relative to the management of the Treasury Department in the last few years, would furnish ample evidence of the necessity of the curtailment of executive authority. But in the face of the well-known facts, to see a Senator rise in his place and hear him say that a section like this, seeking to curtail executive authority, seeking to tell what shall be done and how the money of the people shall be expended, is revolutionary in character, dangerous in principle, destructive of the public interests, and injurious to all the best interests of the country—for I think these were the words with which he closed his speech—was what I never expected to witness on this floor.

Why, sir, the difficulty we have had all the time is to require men to obey the law; and when the Senator from Delaware put the question a little while ago to the chairman of the committee, whether or not it was in the power of any of these Departments to divert the money from the purposes for which Congress gave it and apply it to other purposes, the best answer that the Senator from Iowa could make was that that was the construction of the Treasury Department, and they had done it. I will read to the Senator from Delaware exactly what the law is on this subject, so that he will see that his question was a proper one and well put:

SEC. 3678. All sums appropriated for the various branches of expenditure in the public service shall be applied solely to the objects for which they are respectively made, and for no others.

We passed that when I was a member of the Committee on Appropriations of the House in 1870, July 12, together with this section:

SEC. 3679. No Department of the Government shall expend, in any one fiscal year, any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations.

There are a great many other stringent laws endeavoring to bind these officials; and if the views of the Senator from Ohio prevail we have utterly failed. The only power we have to require them to comply with the laws is to pass just such a section as is here inserted by the House, and to make it, if possible, more stringent, instead of destroying it, as the Senator from Ohio asks us to do.

While the Senator from Ohio was speaking I sent to the document-room for a report that I now hold in my hand, recollecting that one of the reasons why these laws were passed, that in the Treasury Department over which he presided so long, it was ascertained that there were a large number of employés not provided for by any appropriation bill, and Congress could not understand how that could be. Mr. Boutwell was then Secretary of the Treasury, and we sent a resolution to him demanding to know how many employés he had, where they were employed, and how they were paid. I sent to the document-room and obtained, and now hold in my hand, Executive Document No. 93, second session, Forty-first Congress, sent by that Secretary, giving the names of the parties employed, the amount paid, where they were employed, in what division or bureau; and while I have not had time to add it up in the last few minutes since I got it from the document-room, my recollection is that it developed the fact that he had then over 3,400 people employed in the Treasury Department at Washington, while we were making appropriations for less than 1,600.

The question was asked how was it done, and it seemed they had a fund of 1 per cent. or 3 per cent. of something in connection with the refunding of the public debt from which they had a surplus, and they took that money, amounting to $18,000,000, and expended it to suit themselves for anybody they pleased. And the Secretary organized in the Secretary's office seven distinct bureaus with heads of bureaus and paid them whatever he liked, without the shadow of law and in defiance of law. It took the House of Representatives five years under the lead of Mr. Kellogg, a Representative from Connecticut, to bring that Treasury Department into an organization that had something like the semblance of law. But now the Senator from Ohio calls all these efforts revolutionary, destructive of the public interests, injurious to the country, and he wants us to return back to the system when Secretaries were autocrats, when they could do as they liked with the money, do what they pleased, call it "carpets," and buy lemonade and ice cream with it and then say that was for the good of the public service!

No, sir; the trouble is not that we are holding them to too strict an account; it is that we are not holding them to a strict enough account. The late Secretary of the Treasury, now Senator from Ohio, when the question was put to him by the Committee on Appropriations two years ago as to whether it was not a proper thing to do to convert a large number of appropriations known as permanent indefinite appropriations into a form where they would come before Congress, said what? We showed him that the so-called supervisors of elections and marshals were paid out of a permanent fund; that the expense of collecting the customs revenue was paid out of a fund raised by fines and forfeitures that Congress knew nothing about, and men got just what the Department pleased to allow. There are four pages of the Revised Statutes of such permanent appropriations. Let me read one:

SEC. 3687. There is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,750,000, for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for each half year, in addition to such sums as may be received from fines, penalties, and forfeitures connected with the customs, and from fees paid into the Treasury by customs officers, and from storage, cartage, draygage, labor, and services.

Who knows what sum that produces? Who knows who gets it? Who knows whether it is a campaign fund or whether it is in fact paid, or whether a man is paid 10 per cent. more than he wants or is entitled to, provided he will subscribe the 10 per cent. to run the primaries? Now, you come to section 3689:

SEC. 3689. There are appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes hereinafter specified, such sums as may be necessary for the same respectively; and such appropriations shall be deemed permanent annual appropriations.

And then comes a list extending from the top of page 724 down to page 729 of the Revised Statutes, in which millions of dollars are placed in the hands of public officials for all sorts of purposes about which Congress absolutely knows nothing, either as to amounts or as to anything else, so far as I know. That was so flagrant that when the Committee on Appropriations called upon the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Sherman, for a number of those things that ought to be brought before Congress annually, instead of as now seeking to take away from us even what we are doing, he wrote this letter to the then chairman of the Committee on Appropriations:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 28, 1880.

Hon. H. G. DAVIS,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate:

SIR: Referring to Senate bill No. 886, for the repeal of certain laws relating to permanent and indefinite appropriations, recently submitted for an expression of my views regarding its provisions, and for a statement of the appropriations which will be affected thereby, I have the honor to state that while the system of annual appropriations which gives to Congress proper supervision of all appropriations and expenditures is undoubtedly correct, its general adoption should not be enforced without allowing sufficient time for a proper consideration of the estimates of amounts required to replace the appropriations to be repealed, especially so as the estimates of the various Departments for next year have been already submitted to Congress, and in many cases reported upon by the committees having them in charge.

In view, also, of the inconvenience, if not embarrassment, that would for a time attend this change of system, I would respectfully recommend that the date of repeal be changed to take effect from and after June 30, 1881, which, it is believed, is as early a date as would be wise to adopt for the repeal of so large a class of appropriations.

The following form of bill, which provides for the disposition of such balances as may remain to the credit of these appropriations at the expiration of the period of limitation, is believed to cover more fully all points at issue than the one already introduced, and it is respectfully suggested that it be substituted therefor, viz.

Which is almost a literal copy of the bill passed by the Senate some months ago, which I had proposed to offer, and now think I will offer as an amendment to section 4 of this bill or as an additional section, adding one or two things which perhaps did not meet with much favor from the Secretary. I propose to add to the bill drawn by the Secretary himself in order to give us the supervision which we are now seeking and which section 4 endeavors to give in the following form:

Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to repeal, change, or in any manner alter the act of February 28, 1878, entitled "An act to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and to restore its legal-tender character," or chapter 186, supplement to the Revised Statutes, entitled, "An act to promote the education of the blind:" And provided further.

I propose that change of his bill, because I found on examination that the Secretary, in telling us the large number of bills that would be affected by this and the permanent appropriations which would be destroyed if it were passed, included in the list the act of February 28, 1878, twentieth volume Statutes at Large, page 25, entitled, "An act to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and to restore its legal-tender character." I did not care to repeal that, nor did I care to repeal provisions that were made for the blind asylum, situated in the city of Louisville. They were, when the bill was drawn by the Senator from West Virginia, omitted, because his attention was not specially called to them, but the Secretary had his attention called to them, and in the list, which contains seventy-five or eighty, these will be found. I hope Senators will get report No. 334, second session Forty-sixth Congress, and they will see just what the then Secretary of the Treasury proposed to do, not only what we are doing now in the fourth section of this bill, but sent us a list of appropriations so as to bring under our annual consideration millions beyond what the fourth section will now bring, and I think it was the best suggestion made by that distinguished gentleman while he was Secretary of the Treasury.

Why should the custom-houses in New York and the custom-houses all over the country employ whom they please and pay what fines, penalties, and forfeitures they may choose to anybody they please to employ at any price? Why should these executive officers have the right to refund fines or penalties to anybody they please, or refuse to refund to anybody they please? In other words, why should they be absolute masters of the situation? When you come to look over this list, which is an appendix to the bill furnished by the Secretary, you will see what immense sums of money are used without any sort of supervision by Congress. I am rather glad the question has come up, because this will call the attention of the Senate to the high authority of the distinguished Senator. The sums are not trifling.

Collection of revenue from customs, fines, penalties, &c., not given by years, from 1865 to 1879, but in the year 1879 the amount was $5,500,000, the total during these years being $79,851,000, all of which passed through the hands of employés without Congress being even asked "by your leave," because the appropriation had been made permanent. I forget the amount of money paid to supervisors of election, but it was a pretty large sum, because that too was one of the permanent things. So "refunding the duties on steam agricultural machinery." I see "distributive shares of fines, penalties, and forfeitures $2,520,000." How was that distributed? Distributed under that old moiety system, to the spy and the informer that anybody saw fit to appoint, and nobody knew anything about it. I am quoting from Executive Document No. 3, third session Forty-sixth Congress, which contains the full list.

But I do not propose to argue this elaborately. I propose to show to the Senate that so far from the proposition now made to the Senate being dangerous or revolutionary, every suggestion in it three years ago met the approval of the Senator from Ohio while he was Secretary of the Treasury, and he drew the bill that passed the Senate to make all these permanent indefinite appropriations come before Congress annually, because he approved the principle and said that they ought to come here; and now he denounces a movement in that direction as being revolutionary in character and dangerous to the public interest, if not to the public liberties.

Why, sir, the Secretary of the Navy came before us the other day and in looking over the expenditures he said—and whatever a Secretary says to a committee I suppose is public—"give me an additional clerk here." We asked, "Why do you want it?" He told us. It was reasonable; it looked right; we gave it to him. He said, "I have consented to strike down sixteen copyists, sixteen very respectable ladies that my predecessor put there and paid out of some sort of contingent fund. If they have ever done anything I do not know it; if there is anything for them to do now I do not know it. If you appropriate for them I will try to find them something to do, but I shall be soundly abused for letting them go." But they are gone. That is the condition of things the Senator from Ohio desires to bring about—to let the Secretary of the Navy have a fund out of which he can employ whom he pleases and pay what he pleases and do what he pleases with that fund, just as Secretary Chandler found sixteen highly respectable ladies of large influence living in Washington borne on the rolls of his Department, put there by his predecessor, with no use for them, no business to do except to draw their salaries, and each of them will become very indignant, and so will her friends, because her employment is withdrawn.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Do I understand the Senator from Kentucky to say that for years such things could be done without any record of them?

Mr. BECK. No, I beg pardon; I did not say there were no data; I said the matter never came before Congress. Of course reports were made to the proper Auditor of the Treasury, but it is not reported to us except we find it in hunting over the Auditor's or the Treasurer's reports, and you would not know what it meant when you came across it, and you are never asked to look at it. So it is with all that class of cases. We have to give now in one of the bills to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue two or three hundred thousand dollars here and a hundred and fifty thousand dollars there to employ what he calls revenue agents, informers, and detectives, and he employs whom he pleases and puts them where he likes, and pays them what he pleases. We are seeking now to have them reported to us, why he employed them, and what he paid them, so that Congress will have some sort of knowledge where the money goes. That is called revolutionary by the Senator from Ohio.

There never was, in my judgment, a section drawn better intended and more calculated to promote the public good than the fourth and fifth sections of this bill, and the only trouble is that they do not go far enough and they ought to be amended, and I hope will be, by adopting the bill which was passed by the Senate on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia, as drawn by the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. SHERMAN, himself, abolishing the permanent indefinite appropriations, so that we shall know where the money goes and how it is expended and what amounts are paid.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I listened, as I always do, with pleasure to the Senator from Kentucky, and tried to comprehend exactly what he meant, but I have failed in this instance. So far as annual appropriations by Congress are concerned, I stand with him and with those who go the farthest. I think the appropriations should be made by Congress annually, and permanent appropriations should only be made for the public debt and a few particular objects of appropriation which have by common consent been made the subject of permanent appropriation from the foundation of the Government; I mean such appropriations as involve the public credit.

But that is not the question that I am discussing, although the Senator from Kentucky seemed to think it was. Annual appropriations should be made by Congress. How? They should be made by Congress so that a plain man could understand when he read the bill whether it was made in pursuance of law or whether it was the creation of a new law. The first complaint I made of these appropriation bills was, that you may read them from beginning to end, and you cannot tell how much is in accordance with law, how much is for new objects of appropriation not before that time in the law. Take this bill as it comes to us from the House of Representatives. Is there anything in the bill to indicate that some of these items had been already regulated and fixed by law? Nothing of the kind. The Senator from Iowa himself says that a large body of the expenditures of the Government depends upon annual appropriations made from year to year, and that the Treasury Department contains a regular organization provided for by law. Has not that organization been fixed? Why not take the bill fixing the organization, and not repeat in parrot form these appropriation bills from year to year.

But, sir, after you have exhausted your individual appropriations that you have in providing for all the regular employés and clerks, the great body of the expenditure of the Government is made in bulk, and you cannot have it otherwise; you cannot make it otherwise. What is the bulk of your expenditure? There is the Army, there is the Navy, there are the public works on rivers and harbors done under the direction of the Engineer Corps; there are the public buildings, built under the direction of the Treasury Department and the Architect of the Capitol; there are the pensions, one hundred and odd millions; there is the collection of customs, there is the collection of internal revenue. How can you define these? I would not venture to say exactly how much are the regular appropriations fixed by law, but I would say in general terms that four-fifths of the aggregate of the appropriations made by Congress are made in general terms, from their nature indefinable. You direct a public building to be erected at Hartford and appropriate $350,000 to construct it. That is all the law there is on the subject. How can you undertake to regulate who shall be employed to construct that building? You cannot do it. You may by general law say that contracts shall be let to the lowest bidder; you may make limitations or qualifications, but practically you must leave the details to an executive officer.

The Senator from Kentucky says there is no accountability. Why, surely there is. The money is disbursed by one set of officers and accounted for by another, and finally it undergoes the surveillance of the Treasury officials, who are independent officers, created so by law, absolutely independent of the President or of the Secretary or of anybody else. The accounting officers pass finally upon these accounts, and they are published. What greater guards can you throw around them?

But it is said that sometimes clerks have been employed out of general appropriations for such purposes. So they are, and necessarily have to be. How can you erect a public building without a superintendent and a clerk and an agent and various paraphernalia? Where is the law that fixes the number of clerks needed in erecting a public building in Texas? You are going to have one in Frankfort, Kentucky, now. Where is the law to regulate the number of clerks and the wages of the superintendents and men required there? You cannot do it. You must leave such things to the superintendence of executive officers. For instance, the superintendent of the building at Frankfort might be of one class, because it will not be a very expensive building, while the superintendent of the building at Cincinnati, a building costing several millions of dollars, must be a man of the very highest professional attainments. You cannot regulate the pay.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Does the Senator think section 4 relates to what he is now talking about? It does not relate to the subject the Senator is talking about, the erection of buildings.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know that; but it does relate to those employed here who prepare plans.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then there is provision for that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know that. I read it awhile ago, when the Senator was not here. I understand what I am about; I say four-fifths of the expenditure of the Government must be made from general appropriations, and you cannot limit them in the way you do by this appropriation bill. What can you do about these appropriations? Are you going to attempt to regulate all this vast expenditure of money? You cannot do it.

We are called upon to appropriate about $17,000,000 for harbors and rivers, &c. Whom are you going to trust that to? Necessarily to the officers having in charge that expenditure. Can you regulate that expenditure? No; and that expenditure is more wisely cared for, more scrupulously and exactly accounted for than any appropriation that is under the supervision of Congress. Congress, while it may talk all the time about having a watchful care over the Treasury and over the expenditures of the Government, can regulate the number of clerks that shall be employed; it may regulate the number of bureau officers; it may fix their salaries; it may limit them—that it may do, and that is the end of it. Your boasted supervision of public expenditures comes to this: that while you may regulate the regular employés of the Government here in Washington, you must depend upon executive officers to expend the money. There is no guard that you may throw around its expenditure that I would not vote for; there is no protection in the disbursement of the public money that I would not cheerfully vote for, but in the disbursement of that money you must trust to the discretion of the executive officers, because they are not definable by legislation.

I criticise, therefore, not the Committee on Appropriations, because I believe we never had a better one in the Senate, but I criticise this bill, first, that it is too ample, not in substance but in detail; that two lines could express what fifty lines here contain. The result would be then that we should know that those two lines contained no appropriation of public money that was not already regulated by law or fixed by a previous appropriation. If there is no law fixing the number and salaries of the various employés, then take the last appropriation as the number, and in a single line you can appropriate for a whole bureau or whole division all that is necessary, either according to the existing law or according to the number and amount of the previous appropriation. Suppose you appropriate for the Fifth Auditor's Office "for the Fifth Auditor and for the clerks and employés of his office during the current fiscal year," so much. Then you have it all.

But, sir, as the bills are framed and brought to us we cannot tell but what they give a dozen new clerks in this Auditor's Office. There is nothing to indicate it in the bill, and you have got to go to the law and to previous appropriations before you can ascertain. The Committee on Appropriations no doubt will find it out, but their bill when reported to us does not and cannot give us this information.

Now, as to the permanent appropriations I think I could show, if it was allowable, that several of these provisions—the most important on the statute-books now—are provisions that were put into the statutes at a time when I had something to do with the appropriation bills, and especially the limitations in regard to permanent appropriations. The permanent appropriations are in the statutes of the United States. There is no secrecy about them, no trouble about them. Here they all are, printed in black and white.

When I was called upon to say whether or not some of these might not be covered into the Treasury and be made annual I recommended that the great body of them should be made annual, excepting only those which related to the public credit. No man would desire to have the appropriation for the interest on the public debt to depend upon the accidental inability of Congress to pass the appropriation bill before the 1st of July. Suppose, for instance, that the interest on the public debt was made annual, dependent upon this appropriation bill; it could not be paid on the 1st day of July. There would be a breach of the public faith, caused simply by the neglect to pass an annual appropriation bill in time. By the permanent law of the land since the foundation of the Government certain appropriations have been made permanent in their character. One of them is the collection of the customs; one of them is the payment of the interest on the public debt; another is certain military appropriations made for the support of the Army, especially for distributing arms among the States. Appropriations of that kind were held to be proper subjects of permanent appropriation. Here are five pages of them in the Revised Statutes. The great body of these could properly be covered into the Treasury and made annual, because they are not such that if there was a neglect of a day to pass the appropriation there would be no harm to the public credit. Therefore I have always been in favor of it.

Here is another little provision of this bill that will create embarrassment. I think the Senator from Kentucky will feel it if he should ever be called upon to enforce a law as well as to make a law. It is provided in the fourth section:

> And hereafter all moneys accruing from lapsed salaries, or from unused appropriations for salaries, shall be covered into the Treasury.

Since the beginning of the Government, I may say, whenever a clerk or employé has been absent without pay, the head of the Department has been allowed to employ some one as a substitute to take his place, and there has been no loss to the Treasury, no want of accountability, but it has been done, and these lapsed funds have been the basis of many of the employments complained of. Why should not that continue? Suppose clerks want to go away for two or three or four months, to be absent without losing their places, to be absent on leave and without pay; why should not their salaries be used to employ other clerks to perform their duties? No abuse can arise out of it.

But the Senator says that at one time there were 3,500 employés on the Treasury rolls, and only 1,600 provided for by appropriations. How easy that is explained. The great body of the employés of the Treasury Department at the time Mr. Boutwell was Secretary were employed in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. All those employés went to make up the number of 3,500. They were employed by the day or by the piece. More than one-half of the employés today in the Treasury Department are employed by the day or the piece, and are not upon a Treasury roll except as laborers in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. They are not named; they are not designated; they are not prescribed for in this bill, and there will be grave complications when you come to consider and apply the principles of this bill to such bureaus as the Bureau of Engraving and Printing; you must appropriate a gross sum for that business. Indeed, I do not know even the names or the character of the employés. I know there are plate-printers, and plate-wipers, and typesetters, and I do not know what other classes of employés; I cannot describe them. How can you say how many shall be needed at any time during any particular month or year? Now and next year, in spite of this law, from the necessity of the case and the necessities of employment, more than one-half the persons employed in this city in the Treasury Department will not come within the limits of your appropriation, and yet the work will go on all the same; it must necessarily go on.

You appropriate $300,000, or $500,000, or whatever it may be, for printing and engraving, and that is all the law there is about it. Upon that basis the Secretary of the Treasury, through the chief of that division, employs plate-printers by the hundred, plate-wipers, and all the various employés necessary to carry on this most difficult work. Among them are some of the highest paid employés of the Government—engravers, skilled men who have to be selected and kept with care. They are not provided for by your annual appropriation bills; they are paid out of a gross sum of money, and necessarily must be so, because they vary from day to day.

I say, then, the safer guide is to make your laws rigid to guard the expenditure of public money in every way possible, and then make the appropriation broad and liberal, holding the executive officers to accountability.

When Congress resolves itself into a department to execute its laws it fails in its functions. It is utterly idle for you to attempt to regulate all these various items of disbursement. They must depend upon the discretion of executive officers. Congress being the highest authority in this country, its powers must be general, not special, not reduced to detail. It may declare principles, it may appropriate money, but after all you must depend on the honesty, integrity, and fidelity of executive officers in the disbursement of that money. No guard of yours, no paper law, no provisions like this can prevent the necessary employment of executive agents.

Mr. President, I am as much in favor of guarding the public expenditures as any one; but when you undertake to do it in this way, so as to embarrass the public service, I know that at the next session of Congress the Senator from Kentucky and the other members of the Committee on Appropriations will be reporting provisions to guard against and avoid the very provisions contained in this bill.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I rise merely to correct what I think to be an erroneous impression under which the committee itself is laboring, and which the chairman of the committee, perhaps inadvertently, has conveyed to the Senate, and of course to the country, in regard to the expenditure of the contingent fund appropriation by the Commissioner of Education. He spoke of it as a lump sum of $15,000 appropriated to be expended in work outside of the office, but which the Commissioner, to a large extent, has seen fit to expend in the office for clerical labor performed in the office. I think from the possibly somewhat step-fatherly way in which the committees of both the Senate and the House have treated the Bureau of Education in the appropriations of this year, that they have acted under this misapprehension. If they will be at the trouble to examine the law itself of last year—and it was similar in years previous—they will see that this $15,000 which has been the subject of considerable talk and controversy is a contingent appropriation, made under terms covering work both in the office and out of the office, and it has always been partially expended in payment for clerical services rendered in the office, according to the varied necessities which might exist there and outside.

The remark of the Senator from Iowa was that this money, appropriated to be expended outside of the office, had been used for the purpose of compensating clerks employed within it. This was in the exercise of a discretion which it will be seen that the Commissioner had under the law itself, and the greatly increasing interest which has been felt in the cause of education throughout the country during the last year made it imperatively necessary that a larger proportion of this $15,000—some two-thirds of it, in fact—should be expended for clerical work in the office itself during the last year, and for no other reason whatever was it thus expended; and the appropriation which has been so necessary and hitherto so largely expended outside in the collection of statistics by experts, and in the writing of reports by experts, has thus been trenched upon in the ordinary necessary performance of the duties of the office itself.

Why, Mr. President, during the last year the amount of correspondence in that office has more than doubled; and I have here a list of the subjects mentioned in inquiries for information which they are obliged to reply to. Every topic itself suggests and requires a treatise almost, and of course a very large amount of labor, not merely clerical labor, but intelligent, expert labor in the office itself is made necessary, and thus this $15,000 has been trenched upon by expenditures in the office. Look at the list:

> Letters requiring special attention have been received within a recent date on the following subjects:

48. Truancy and duties of truant officers.
49. Weal legislation.
50. Summer schools.
51. Valuation of school property.
52. Courses of study.

I wish that this matter should be distinctly understood, and I will call attention to the language of the law itself as it has been hitherto, because most certainly the criticism of the chairman of the committee was unjust. The law under which the expenditure is made is this:

For collecting statistics and writing and compiling matter for annual and special reports, and editing and publishing circulars of information, $15,000.

So it is quite apparent that it covers necessarily work done in the office as well as work done out of the office if in the discretion of the Commissioner it is necessary that it be there performed.

Acting upon this erroneous impression, as I suppose it must be—I do not see what other reason there can be—the committee have this year very properly made a direct appropriation for the increased clerical work necessary in the office itself, and they have specified the clerks, they have specified the amount that is to be paid to each, which is all very well, and it is a fair treatment of the office itself. But, on the other hand, while the demand is increasing for expert labor for the preparation of reports on various subjects outside of the office, they have reduced the appropriation from $15,000, which might have been thus expended for this increased labor within the office, to $2,200. I think it is an injustice to the office, based upon a misapprehension, and at the proper time I desire to ask the Senate to correct it.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that debate on these fourth and fifth sections may be limited to five minutes by each Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The order will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. BECK. Does that apply to amendments to the sections?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think you had better apply it to the whole bill from this out. I suggest that.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the chairman whether he wishes to take up the House resolution before I proceed, the resolution which ought to be acted on to-day to which he has called my attention?

Mr. ALLISON. I would be glad to have taken from the table a joint resolution which must be passed and signed by the President before to-morrow night. I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent the pending bill will be laid aside.

Mr. ALLISON. It is a joint resolution relating to appropriations that I wish acted on.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 248) to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government was read the first time, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That all appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government under existing laws which shall remain unprovided for on the 30th day of June, 1882, be and they are hereby continued and made available for a period of fifteen days from and after that date, unless the regular appropriations hereafter provided for in bills now pending in Congress shall have been previously made for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883; and in case the appropriations, or any of them, hereby continued are or is insufficient to carry on the said necessary operations, a sufficient amount is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to carry on the same: Provided, That no greater amount shall be expended thereafter than will be in the same proportion to the appropriations of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, as fifteen days' time bears to the whole of said fiscal year: Provided further, That authority is also granted for continuing during the same period the necessary work required for public printing and binding and for all other miscellaneous objects provided under the sundry civil and naval appropriation acts in advance of appropriations to be hereafter made for said objects: And further provided, That all sums expended under this act shall be charged to, and be deducted from, the appropriations for like service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say that this joint resolution is substantially a copy of the joint resolution passed in 1876, found in the 19th volume United States Statutes, page 65.

Mr. GARLAND. I recollect that, but I suppose it would be better to put this at twenty days instead of fifteen.

Mr. BECK. That is so, but I suppose we can extend it hereafter rather than embarrass it now by amending it. It ought to be twenty days.

Mr. ALLISON. I think so, and I think it might as well be amended to twenty days now. I therefore move to strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty," so that it may go back to the House at once.

Mr. HARRIS. The same amendment will have to be repeated in two or three places.

Mr. ALLISON. Wherever the word "fifteen" occurs let it be changed to "twenty."

The joint resolution was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves to amend the joint resolution by inserting "twenty" in lieu of "fifteen" wherever it occurs.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 3207) giving the assent of Congress to the mayor and city council of Nashville, Tennessee, to construct a free bridge over the Cumberland River was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 69) authorizing the Public Printer to pay the employés of the Government Printing Office the pay deducted from them during the obsequies of the late President Garfield, and for other purposes, was read the first time by its title.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have been requested by several Senators to ask for the present consideration of that resolution.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think it had better go to the committee. It can be reported to-morrow.

The joint resolution was read the second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. ANTHONY, Mr. DAWES, Mr. FERRY, Mr. GARLAND, and Mr. HARRISON submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. VOORHEES, from the Joint Select Committee on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 1810) to authorize the Rock Island and Southwestern Railway Company to construct a bridge over the Mississippi River at New Boston, State of Illinois;

A bill (S. No. 1020) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River at the town of Van Buren, Crawford County, Arkansas;

A bill (H. R. No. 3830) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 5664) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 58) to print Dr. John L. Hayes's pamphlet upon the husbandry of the Angora goat.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6244) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now considering section 4. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations is, in line 3, to strike out "hereafter" and insert "after the 1st day of October next."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it the understanding that the limitation of debate to five minutes shall prevail?

Mr. INGALLS. Not to the bill, but to these sections. Without knowing what amendments are to be proposed hereafter I shall object to a limitation of five minutes being applied to the entire bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was only to these two sections.

Mr. ALLISON. Sections 4 and 5.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think section 4 is a movement in the right direction. It is intended to uncover and to bring to light a good many abuses that have heretofore occurred in the Departments. I regret that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is not in his seat. It will be noticed that section 4 applies only to the District of Columbia, not to the country generally, and therefore it does not apply to anything outside of the District.

Now, to show how many people have been employed and paid from miscellaneous funds not known to either House of Congress, I find in a document just printed, House report No. 1276, first session Forty-seventh Congress, that in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury proper this year there are one hundred and ten persons employed and paid out of miscellaneous funds. If the Senator from Ohio were in his seat I should ask if he knew how they were paid. I find that there are one hundred and ten persons paid from some fund or other in the Treasury Department that very few if any of us know anything about. That is about one-fourth of the whole force in the office.

I turn to the office of internal revenue and I find there are forty-nine persons there employed and paid out of some fund or other that that Commissioner has in some way not known to us. Again, in another branch of the Department, the Light-House Board, I find there are twelve persons paid under the appropriation bills proper and twenty-four paid out of miscellaneous funds, so that there are two to one in that office paid out of some fund or other that Congress has had no knowledge of heretofore. I find in the topographer's office there are thirty-eight paid out of miscellaneous funds and one paid under the appropriation bill regularly.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask a question?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand the Senator to say that nobody in Congress knows from whence the Departments derive their funds. Does he know where they get the money to pay these employés.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not know out of what special fund, but it is out of some of the miscellaneous funds voted for some other purpose, instead of for the direct compensation of employés. I know that a part of this was from the stationery fund, a fund appropriated for the purchase of stationery, and out of that fund they pay half a dozen clerks and pay others out of the carpet fund. Here are twelve cabinet-makers paid out of miscellaneous funds when heretofore not one has been provided for specially by law. They have been employed without authority of law. There has been a regular cabinet shop started in the Treasury to make furniture of every kind, and the employés are paid out of some fund that different Secretaries find in the Department.

I find the summary of this is that there are 5,315 clerks and employés paid from the regular list and there are 840 persons in the several Departments about Washington paid from miscellaneous funds.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's five minutes are up.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I should have been glad to be able to go on and state what are the facts.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, in part answer to the inquiry of the Senator from South Carolina, I can show one way by which a fund has been created and temporary employments made out of it. We prescribe by law that there shall be a certain number of clerks of classes 1, 2, 3, and 4. A vacancy occurs in class 4. They refuse to fill that vacancy; they decline to put anybody in that vacancy, and that is a lapsed salary, and that lapsed fund is taken to pay Tom, Dick, and Harry employed without any previous authority of law.

Mr. BUTLER. On a temporary roll?

Mr. COCKRELL. On a temporary roll, and that lapsed fund can be made almost indefinitely large. That is in addition to the contingent fund that the Senator from West Virginia has spoken of. I know of one instance where a clerk receiving the highest pay in a bureau was changed; the office became vacant, and that office had remained at the time I obtained the information about one year without anybody having been put in, at a salary of $1,800, I think. That enabled two or three to be put on temporary duty at $60 or $75 a month.

The object of this section is simply to prescribe the particular classes of persons that can be employed, to make specific appropriations for them, and stop their doing anything else. It is right, it is just, it is proper, and it is the interest of every head of every Department of this Government to have this become the law. Make this the law, and there will then be no danger of any scandal or anything of that kind growing up in the service.

Mr. BECK. I should like to say a word. The best illustration of the necessity of making appropriations specific was developed by what took place in the Patent Office ten or twelve years ago. Up to that time we had not required the money which was received by the Patent Office to be paid into the Treasury, but allowed them for years to expend all the money received from inventors. They spent it just as fast as they got the money in. No matter what the amount, they spent it all. The House of Representatives and the Senate at last passed a law requiring all the money to be paid into the Treasury, and the expenses to be drawn out of the Treasury, and instead of taking $300,000, $400,000, or $500,000, and spending it all, the very moment we required that to be done the receipts exceeded the expenditures by from $100,000 to $200,000. They spent it for temporary clerks, for every purpose, and spent the last dollar that came in. The very moment the money received had to be paid into the Treasury, and they had to account for whom they employed and what they were doing, all that was stopped.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 4, line 9, after the word "year," to insert:

But in case of appropriations for any specific purpose where the compensation of the necessary employés or laborers is not named, the officer or person having charge of the expenditure of such appropriations may pay the rate usual and proper for such employé or laborer for the time actually employed; and after the 1st day of October next.

And in line 15, after the word "and," to insert "after the 1st day of October next;" so as to read:

But in case of appropriations for any specific purpose where the compensation of the necessary employés or laborers is not named, the officer or person having charge of the expenditure of such appropriations may pay the rate usual and proper for such employé or laborer for the time actually employed; and after the 1st day of October next, section 172 of the Revised Statutes, and all other laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act, and all laws and parts of laws authorizing the employment of officers, clerks, draughtsmen, copyists, messengers, assistant messengers, mechanics, watchmen, laborers or other employés at a different rate of pay or in excess of the numbers authorized by appropriations made by Congress, be, and they are hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, after the word "and" in line 23, to insert "thereafter;" and in line 27, after the word "and," to strike out "hereafter" and insert "thereafter;" so as to read:

And thereafter all details of civil officers, clerks, or other subordinate employés from places outside of the District of Columbia for duty within the District of Columbia, except temporary details for duty connected with their respective offices, be, and are hereby, prohibited; and thereafter all moneys accruing from lapsed salaries, or from unused appropriations for salaries, shall be covered into the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add the following proviso to section 4:

Provided, That the sums herein specifically appropriated for clerical or other force heretofore paid for out of general or specific appropriations may be used by the several heads of Departments to pay such force until the said several heads of Departments shall have adjusted the said force in accordance with the provisions of this act; and such adjustment shall be effected before October 1, 1882. And in making such adjustment the employés herein provided for shall, as far as may be consistent with the interests of the service, be apportioned among the several States and Territories according to population: Provided further, That any person performing duty in any capacity as officer, clerk, or otherwise in any Department at the date of the passage of this act who has heretofore been paid from any appropriation made for contingent expenses or for any contingent or general purpose, and whose office or place is specifically provided for herein, under the direction of the head of that Department may be continued in such office, clerkship, or employment without a new appointment thereto.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask the Senator from Iowa whether he expects to finish the bill to-night?

Mr. ALLISON. I hope to finish it to-night. I think we can probably do so.

Mr. BECK. At this point I proposed to move to insert as an additional section the bill which passed the Senate almost unanimously in regard to permanent appropriations, but if it is likely to embarrass this bill I can offer it as an amendment to the sundry civil bill just as well.

Mr. HALE. I suggest to the Senator from Kentucky to put it on the sundry civil bill.

Mr. BECK. If the bill is not finished to-night I shall offer it in the morning; if the bill is to be finished to-night I shall not offer it.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read section 5 of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out section 6 to the word "employed," in line 16, in the following words:

That the Secretary of War is directed to transfer all the records in the office of the Surgeon-General of the Army from which the evidence is furnished for the settlement of claims for invalid pensions, and also the clerks and others employed upon such records, to the office of the Adjutant-General of the Army, if in his judgment the work of furnishing such evidence will be facilitated or the number of clerks employed upon such work can be materially reduced in number by such transfer. And in the event of such transfer there shall be set apart and used, under the orders of the Secretary of War, so much of the funds appropriated for the contingencies of the Surgeon-General's Office as has or may be estimated necessary to provide the stationery, blank books, furniture, and other articles necessary for the use of the clerks and others transferred, and for the proper dispatch of the business upon which they shall be employed.

Mr. PLUMB. I hope this first amendment to section 6, striking out that section from line 1 to line 16, inclusive, will not be agreed to. It will be observed that it provides for the transfer practically by the Secretary of War, upon his judgment, of the records of the office of the Surgeon-General, so far as they relate to pensions, to the office of the Adjutant-General.

The theory of the provision is that it will promote the settlement of pension claims. I thought myself, when this proposition was first made, that it ought to be carried. Reflection, and information which I have received since that time, satisfy me entirely that we shall not only save a very large amount of money by such a transfer, but that we shall do what is of a great deal more consequence at a much earlier period, that is, settle the claims of pensioners who have got a just and specific obligation against the Government, than we can by striking out the language as the committee propose.

I understand, although I was not present at the time the Commissioner of Pensions was before the committee, that the Commissioner of Pensions was very decidedly of that opinion.

I have been informed from sources which I regard as entitled to the utmost credit that under the process and plan of doing business now prevailing in the Surgeon-General's Office it amounts to a suspension of business, rather than to a completion of it. Inevitably when an inquiry is made from the Pension Office in regard to the record of a soldier who has made an application for a pension, that inquiry must be divided in the Pension Office, one branch of it going to the Adjutant-General's Office and the other going to the Surgeon-General's Office. The clerical work alone of taking care of two or three hundred thousand applications for pensions is in itself an enormous thing. That duplication of inquiry is further duplicated in the operations of the offices themselves in making replies, so that there is a very large force necessarily employed for the purpose of the clerical work necessary to make these inquiries, which otherwise could be employed in searching the records and in making the statement of facts upon which the judgment of the examiners is based as to the merits of the application for a pension.

In the next place, there is nothing sacred about these records. There is nothing about them that does not belong as much, for all practical purposes, to the Adjutant-General's Office as the Surgeon-General's Office. The hospital records of the late war are in no way the property of the Surgeon-General's Office in the sense that they pertain to his office particularly. They are a part of the military history of the country and a part of the military history of each soldier who was in hospital and who was treated there. They belong just as much to the Adjutant-General as they do to the Surgeon-General anyhow, and for the purpose of the inquiry necessary to be made to determine whether a given person should have a pension or not they are a thousand-fold more the property of the Adjutant-General than of the Surgeon-General.

We ought now to consolidate these functions. We shall appropriate this year $100,000,000 for pensions. We appropriate it because the law requires it to be paid. We appropriate it because we believe the persons who are to receive this money ought to have it as soon as possible. It is money which is due to these men; it is money which will lighten many a weary load; and it is money which they ought to have at the earliest possible moment. We ought to give it to them at that earliest possible moment, and we ought to do it also with the least possible expense to the Government; and that we can do by bringing together these records, obviating the necessity of the employment of a large force of clerks and vivifying the whole thing under the control of the Adjutant-General of the Army, who is in sympathy with this effort to get the business out of the way, and the Commissioner of Pensions is similarly minded.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I have examined this question with as much care as I could, and I am very clear in the opinion that instead of promoting what the Senator from Kansas thinks would be promoted by retaining the language of the section, the result would be the very reverse of it.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the Senator from Iowa, what the opinion of the Commissioner of Pensions was on that subject?

Mr. ALLISON. The Commissioner of Pensions did not mention the subject. He did not say anything upon this topic to any member of the committee, so far as I know, in the committee-room. So far as the Commissioner of Pensions is concerned, I do not know what his opinion is in reference to it; but here is a most radical change proposed in the organization of the War Department, because you cannot dissever and divide these records. It is practically transferring the records of the Medical Bureau of the Government to the office of the Adjutant-General.

If there is not a good system in the Surgeon-General's Office now for the examination of these claims, we have provided here an Assistant Secretary of War, and we have done other things for the very purpose of overseeing and overlooking the various bureaus in the War Department and making such arrangements as will make them efficient.

Although sympathizing thoroughly with the views of the Senator from Kansas as to the advisability and necessity of facilitating the examination of pension cases, I am satisfied that this provision would have the very reverse effect. Certainly for six months it would have such an effect, because it would take six months to rearrange and reorganize these great volumes in the Surgeon-General's Office and place them under the control and direction of the Adjutant-General.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. May I supplement what the chairman is saying by just a word, and that is that no one claims it would be of any benefit after the pension cases are examined. It is to be only temporary, for a year or two, and then probably the records will be transferred back, or you would disarrange the Department altogether.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I am very much astonished at the position of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in regard to this matter. What is this proposition? Is it proposed to put a bureau under the War Department which is not already under it? The Surgeon-General's Office to-day is a part of the War Department. So is the Adjutant-General's Office. What do we have to-day? The Commissioner of Pensions wants to know a soldier's record, and whether he was wounded. What does he have to do? He writes one letter to the Surgeon-General, and another letter to the Adjutant-General. That is occurring daily. Two letters are written by the Commissioner of Pensions. To get what? The military record and the hospital record of one soldier. The answer is made by the Adjutant-General one day. It is briefed and filed away. It may be a week or a month before the report comes in from the Surgeon-General. Then that letter is taken up by the clerks. Then, if the information is not quite specific, they have to do the same thing over again. Thus, in every pension case two letters have to be written by the Commissioner of Pensions; two letters have to be written to the Commissioner of Pensions in answer; and they have to be briefed and examined.

It is simply proposed to place the jurisdiction and control of these records under the Adjutant-General. There is no occasion for his removing them from where they are; there is no necessity for one particle of change in the personnel of the bureau now working. You put it under the direction of the Adjutant-General. He becomes responsible for it. Then one letter is addressed to the Adjutant-General, asking for the military record and the hospital record, and one letter is written in answer to it to the Commissioner of Pensions, and it is all done in that way, and half the labor saved.

This is not wresting from the Surgeon-General anything that belongs to him; it is simply placing the control and the management of these records under the Adjutant-General for the facilitation of business, the saving of money, and the expedition of the pension cases now pending in the Pension Office.

Mr. PLATT. If the Commissioner of Pensions desires any such thing as this he certainly has not communicated it to me, and as acting chairman of the Committee on Pensions, and having been long a member of that committee, I have had frequent talks with him on the general subject.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question? Is it probable that the Commissioner of Pensions, belonging to the Interior Department, would suggest to the Committee on Pensions a change in the management of another Department or bureau?

Mr. PLATT. I understand that it was stated here that the change is desired by the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL. I did not state that.

Mr. PLATT. If the Commissioner of Pensions desired it, I think he would be as likely to state it to the chairman of the Committee on Pensions as to any other person.

Mr. PLUMB. As I made the statement, I will say that I understood the Commissioner so stated to one or more members of the committee when it was put to him in the form of an inquiry; and I understood from the sub-committee that he believed (or perhaps his language was stronger than that) that this consolidation would facilitate the replies to inquiries which he necessarily had to make of the Surgeon-General and of the Adjutant-General in regard to the military history of applicants for pensions. Perhaps I ought not to have stated it, but I had it from good authority.

Mr. PLATT. What he has stated to others, of course I cannot say. He has stated nothing to me of the sort.

I am clearly of the opinion, from some investigation I have given this matter, that the business of the adjudication of pensions will not be facilitated, but will be delayed by this proposition. I cannot conceive how it is possible that the transfer of the records of the Surgeon-General's Office to the Adjutant-General's Office will facilitate or hasten in any way the adjudication of pensions. As was well remarked by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that it must cause utter confusion and derangement for the next six months, and the business of getting answers from the Surgeon-General's Office to the Pension Commissioner, as it seems to me, would be almost entirely at a standstill for a long time.

Let us see how the situation is. The military history of the soldier is contained in one set of books; they are in the charge of the Adjutant-General. The hospital or surgical history of the soldier is contained in another set of books; they are in charge of the Surgeon-General. The Adjutant-General's records are up at the War Department; the Surgeon-General's records are down on Tenth street, at the old museum building. There are under the charge of the Surgeon-General's Office more than eighteen thousand volumes which have to be consulted in order to ascertain the surgical history of soldiers. There are in addition to these volumes a large number of pamphlets or rolls. Eight million names appear upon those volumes and rolls; that is to say, every soldier is entered over and over again, so that there are 8,000,000 entries there.

This matter has been under the charge of the Surgeon-General for years. Whether his office has been administered with the same vigor and the same system that it might be, it is not necessary to inquire here; but there are one hundred and forty clerks there who are familiar with this business and familiar with the location of these records. To say that these records are to be transported and put all together with the Army records, it seems to me it needs only the statement to show that the facts cannot be as quickly ascertained under the Adjutant-General as under the existing arrangement.

I am very free to say that I think improvements can be made in the Surgeon-General's Office, and I am free to say that I believe they will be made. A large addition has been made to the force of clerks in the Surgeon-General's Office, and I believe that with that addition and the improvements which will be made the delays which have occurred will be less numerous, that they will not extend over the same period that they have extended.

I do not believe that to take these records from the Surgeon-General and put them under the Adjutant-General, who is unfamiliar with them, will in any way facilitate the settlement of pension cases, and I do believe that for a long time to come it will very greatly delay the settlement of pension cases.

I feel very earnestly in this matter. I want the 265,000 pending claims in the Pension Office to be settled as quickly as possible. I do not want three months or six months to be wasted in the Adjutant-General getting control and getting the run of the hospital records. If they are not to be moved, if they are to continue there in the room where they are, certainly it will not facilitate the business, for if he left the records where they are the Adjutant-General would be compelled to have somebody there in charge of them.

As to what the Senator from Missouri says about two letters being written, that necessity would exist in the same way. If the records remain there the search has got to be made at two different points by two different individuals. If they are to be taken up to the War Department, there is no room for them; room will have to be obtained. I do not know how they could be brought together so that one person could make the same search. It seems to me that it would be all wrong to make this transfer.

Mr. PLUMB. It will be observed by the Senate that this provision does not absolutely require the transfer to be made, but that it authorizes the Secretary of War to do so "if in his judgment the work of furnishing such evidence will be facilitated, or the number of clerks employed upon such work can be materially reduced in number by such transfer." I think the Secretary of War will be competent to settle this question of detail, perhaps much more than we. Still the limited knowledge that I have of the operations of the Pension Bureau has led me to a definite conclusion upon this point, and the reasons which I offer may be multiplied, I have no doubt they could be, in the experience of many others.

For instance, A B makes an application for a pension. He sends down his application, his affidavits, &c. The first thing is to ascertain his military history. That military history may consist not only of what is found upon the muster-rolls of his company, but it also consists of the records of the hospital in which he may have been while sick. The inquiry may be addressed to the Adjutant-General for this information. He directs that the rolls of this man's company be searched to ascertain whether he was enrolled or not, and when he enlisted, when he was discharged, if at all, and for what cause, and whether he was recorded upon those rolls as ever having been in hospital. If he is not recorded upon the rolls as having been in hospital, a search of the hospital records is absolutely unnecessary; but as it is now an inquiry goes to the Adjutant-General for the military history to be found in the company roll, and it also goes to the Surgeon-General to find if the man is borne on the rolls of any hospital, and if so, what his treatment was, his disease, &c. In one case you may get by one examination all that you get in the other by two examinations. You get it by one inquiry in place of two inquiries, and the Commissioner of Pensions may get an answer by one reply in place of getting it by two replies.

It is a fact we all know that the Commissioner of Pensions declines to answer inquiries from individual applicants for pensions in regard to the standing of their claims, because he says that it would put the entire force of his office at the mercy of these correspondents, and he cannot do it. He limits himself, therefore, wisely or unwisely, to answering the inquiries preferred by members of the House and Senators. It can readily be seen that in the case of 300,000 correspondents, all of them desirous of knowing from day to day and from week to week about the condition of their claims, foot-sore and weary and worn down by poverty induced by wounds received in the service of their country, they would write a good many letters, and it would put the whole available force in the Pension Office at their disposal. The consequence is that the letters cannot be written.

When you take out all that, you still have a very large amount left in the correspondence of Senators and Members of the House. Then the correspondence between the Commissioner of Pensions and the Adjutant-General and Surgeon-General is in itself an enormous thing. Out of the $2,000,000 which is to be appropriated this year for the purpose of carrying on the operations of the Pension Bureau, that is, the clerical force for that purpose, I venture to say that 25 per cent. will be exhausted in correspondence alone. Any step which we can take here which will relieve the Pension Office of that burden will not only be a saving of money to the Government, but what, as I said before, is a great deal more, it will relieve these needy, deserving people to whom the Government is under great obligation from the delay which otherwise will inevitably ensue.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Is there anything in the law now, or in the regulations of the War Department, that restrains the Secretary of War from ordering the hospital records to be placed in the same building with the Adjutant-General's records?

Mr. PLUMB. I think there is not; and I do not understand that this provision requires a displacement of one single page of these records. It would simply put over them as the head the Adjutant-General in place of the Surgeon-General, leaving the personnel precisely the same.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I desire to make a suggestion. If these records are brought conveniently together, a letter goes forward to the Adjutant-General to have the examination made in the ordinary roll. If the roll has a reference to the hospital in which the soldier has been treated, the same letter may be filed to the chief clerk, or whoever is managing the hospital records under the Surgeon-General's Office, and go through precisely as it would if they were all under one head, the Secretary of War being treated as the head of both.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no doubt a great many things could be done that never will be done except under the sanction of law. It used to be said in the Army in early days that two corporals could get together on a beat and fraternize, but that two major-generals would always get together and fight. That is exactly the condition of things now. The Adjutant-General, the Surgeon-General, the Secretary of War, and so on, do not get together for the purpose of settling the difficulty, but each of them for the purpose of revolving in his own orbit in his own way and for his own purposes—I will not say for his emolument; I do not mean that—but the idea of course is that every man has his own theory about the service irrespective of the general good. I do not speak of that as an offense, but no mere civilian ever undertakes to interfere in any radical way with the personnel, with the duties, with the general management of one of these bureaus, but he finds a certain system has been going on until they are "indurated," according to the statement of the Senator from California, made some time ago in regard to Chinese people, in such a way that he, in his four years' term, is not going to undertake to interfere with it.

Mr. PLATT. If the Secretary of War is authorized to do anything under this section which it is proposed to amend, it is just this:

That the Secretary of War is directed to transfer all the records in the office of the Surgeon-General of the Army from which the evidence is furnished for the settlement of claims for invalid pensions, and also the clerks and others employed upon such records, to the office of the Adjutant-General of the Army.

Mr. PLUMB. Does the Senator think that means a manual transfer?

Mr. PLATT. I do think so.

Mr. PLUMB. How about the clerk himself? Will he have to be removed to another building?

Mr. PLATT. I think it means just this, if it means anything: it means to take the records away from the Museum building on Tenth street and put them under the control of the Adjutant-General in his office in the War Department. If it does not mean that there is nothing to be gained by it under any possible view of it.

There is one thing I intended to say when up before. Congress by an act directed the Surgeon-General to prepare a Medical and Surgical History of the War. That is in progress. It is near completion. This would arrest that.

Mr. PLUMB. It ought to arrest it.

Mr. PLATT. I do not know anything about that; I do not say anything about that; but Congress has directed it; it has appropriated for it; the work is going on. If you want to arrest it, do it in some other way and do not do it in this indirect way.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BUTLER. After the Senator from Illinois concludes I shall move that the five-minute rule be applied to the sixth section of the bill also. I shall make the motion after the Senator from Illinois gets through.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope that will be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to detain the Senate more than a few moments, but I desire to call attention to one proposition in the section. I have just as much confidence in the Secretary of War as has our friend from Kansas; so have I in the Adjutant-General; but let us see the effect of this provision.

I presume if any person would offer an amendment here to transfer the records of the Ordnance Department to the Engineer Department of the Army, anybody could see the reason for that. It would be saying to the Engineer Corps, "You are in disgrace because you do not do your duty; therefore we will transfer your records to somebody else."

That is exactly what you would say. If we were to transfer the Adjutant-General's books and papers to-day to the Engineer Corps, the Adjutant-General ought to resign, because he would say, "I am incompetent to perform the duty, and hence Congress has transferred my books to somebody else." I do not believe in making a declaration of that kind.

I notice that you cannot find a bureau in any Department of the Government that will not commence reaching out to get possession of some other bureau. You will find it is always so. We find all the Departments of the Government that we have reach for power. It is perfectly natural; it is human nature. I do not know what the Adjutant-General says about this matter; I have never talked with him about it. I presume the Secretary of War would do exactly what we suggest to him in this bill.

There is a great deal in what the Senator from Connecticut says, that these medical histories of the war are in progress of preparation to-day. The Senator from Kansas says they ought to stop. I disagree with the Senator from Kansas.

The Medical and Surgical History of the War, as prepared by the Medical Department of this Government, has furnished greater evidence to the scientific world in reference to surgery than has ever been furnished before. The whole scientific corps in surgical colleges and elsewhere are trying to get hold of the Medical and Surgical History of the War, for the reason that there is more evidence in those volumes in regard to science than they have ever found in all the other books that have ever been published since the world began. I do not want them to stop. I think they are important—important for the Army, important to surgery, important to the medical fraternity of this and other countries.

The very moment that you take possession of these records in the Medical Department of this Government and transfer them to the Adjutant-General's Department they pass from under the control of the Medical Department. Not only that, but you say to the Medical Department, "You are not fit to have control of these records; you do not perform your duty; hence we will transfer them to an entirely different department to perform the duty." That is not a very nice thing to do. It is not very well for us to say to this Department, "You are incompetent."

The duplicate-letter business which has been talked about is a very small affair. As was well suggested by the Senator from Indiana, the same letter that goes to the Adjutant-General's Office can be referred to the Medical Department, and there they can act on it without a duplicate.

There is no trouble about this matter, but the one we have had heretofore has been this: we failed to furnish that Department with a sufficient number of clerks to perform the duty until recently. They were 30,000 inquiries behind a year and a half ago on account of want of sufficient clerical force to perform the duty. They are now going forward and performing the duty with a great deal more facility than they have heretofore been able to do, and with the number of clerks which are now provided for the War Department, and which can be applied to the Adjutant-General's Office and the Medical Department both, there ought to be no difficulty whatever in getting a reply to a letter in a very short time.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. In the getting of evidence to grant pensions upon, you have to send to the Quartermaster's Department very often?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. Why not transfer the records of the Quartermaster's Department to the Adjutant-General's Office?

Mr. LOGAN. There are many things I could suggest about transferring different Departments and bureaus. They are really but one. To illustrate: suppose a soldier has failed to get his commutation of rations, where does he write? He writes to the Adjutant-General of the Army for his record to show when he was discharged, where he was discharged, and where he had to go to his home. He has not had commutation of rations. His case has to go to the Commissary Department. Will any man say that because some of the soldiers of this country have claims for commutation of rations, and those claims have to go to the Adjutant-General's Office first, and afterward to the Commissary Department, therefore the records of the Commissary Department should be transferred to the Adjutant-General's Office, in order to facilitate the payment of claims for commutation of rations? Will anybody say that? That case is exactly like this, except that there are so many more claims for pensions than there are for other matters connected with the Army, that some person has got it into his head that all the records of the Army should be transferred to the Adjutant-General's Office, where they certainly do not belong and ought not be placed.

Suppose in examining claims in the Quartermaster's Department you write a letter to the Adjutant-General, or you write a letter to the Secretary of War; you present your case, or ask that a certain claim shall be examined. That is referred to the Quartermaster's Department. Will anybody say because that is a bureau of the War Department, and the records are in the Adjutant-General's Office, and the confederate records are there too, that for the purpose of examining the confederate records to see whether he was a Union man or not, all the records should be transferred to the Adjutant-General's Office? I presume nobody would say so. It is for the Quartermaster-General under the law to pass upon such claims, and hence they go to his department. So it is in reference to the Medical Department.

The records have to show the wounds, the disease, or if in hospital how they got there, whether they went from the regiment, whether they were wounded and taken there. All of these things appear certainly and properly under the Medical Department, and I say now to Senators that to take the records belonging to one bureau of the War Department or one bureau of any Department, and transfer them to another bureau, unless you abolish the bureau from whence you transfer them, is putting the officers at the head of that bureau in disgrace. That is exactly the effect of it, and it is what you say in the bill when you do it. Suppose you transfer the records of the Land Office to the Agricultural Department and do not transfer the Land Office there, would not the Commissioner of the General Land Office say that he was in disgrace; that he was not competent to perform the duties, and would he not resign? He ought to resign in such a case. So it is in any Department of the Government.

In my judgment, whether the Adjutant-General desires this transfer or whether the Secretary of War desires it, is immaterial; it is not a proper thing to do. The records do not belong to the Adjutant-General's Office any more than the records of the Ordnance Department belong to the Adjutant-General's Office. They belong to the Medical Bureau of the War Department, and there they should remain. If the officer in charge is inefficient and fails to perform his duty, there is a remedy for that; and what is it? The remedy is for the Secretary of War to relieve him from duty and put somebody else in charge. He has the power to do it. Congress has no business doing this thing. The President to-morrow can remove any bureau officer and put somebody else in charge. He has a right to do that, and if they fail to perform their duties there is a remedy; but it is not by taking the records away from them and putting them in disgrace.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the five-minute limit to debate be applied to the sixth section of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hearing no objection, the five-minute rule is adopted.

Mr. ALLISON. Now I want to say one word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will apply the rule to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire a paper, a document, a statement from any living person asking for this change. I asked the Secretary of War about it; he said he had not examined it. The Commissioner of Pensions did not mention it. It comes here as a specific, positive measure of legislation upon this bill, without any father. I believe instead of doing what the Senator from Kansas says it will do, it will have the very reverse effect, to embarrass and delay every pension case for several months, in order to dig up these records of eighty or ninety thousand volumes, covering the period of the war.

Mr. LOGAN. I will only say, if the Senator will allow me, suppose you take the medical record of the Adjutant-General's Office where wounds of a certain character are described, can the Adjutant-General, as a professional medical man, tell anything about it, and will he not have to detail a medical officer to make the reports?

Mr. PLUMB. Does the Senator from Illinois mean to suggest that the Surgeon-General himself receives all these letters and replies to them?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir.

Mr. PLUMB. Then no other officer would be expected to do it; and the Senator knows it as well as I do.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to say further that it is not proposed to change the locality of the medical records. The north wing of the War Department, so called, is not large enough to contain the records now under the control of the Surgeon-General, and if you will read the very next portion of the section you will see that it is not in contemplation to change the location of the records at all.

Mr. DAWES. Although I readily coincide with the attempt to be more specific in these appropriations, one defect in the whole bill seems to have manifested itself more particularly here than anywhere else. It is an attempt in Congress to interfere with executive duties. This is all a question of administration, the whole of it. The medical records are one kind of records and the Adjutant-General's are another kind, all under one head; but we here in Congress have an idea that we can manage the executive department a great deal better than the executive can itself. If Senators will turn to the one hundred and fifteenth page, the next page, in the thirty-second line of this sixth section, they will find "that the occupancy of the north half of the east wing, except the two rooms aforesaid, and of the fourth story and attic of the south wing of the State, War, and Navy building" is to be assigned to particular clerks and to particular officials under the Secretary of War, not by the Secretary of War, not by the President, over them all, but by us here in Congress. That is a defect in the bill as it comes to us from the House, and the amendment of the committee striking out this attempt on the part of Congress to regulate executive duties here, and a like amendment to which I have called the attention of the Senate on the next page, are, it seems to me, necessary, if we will let the executive department do its duty and try as well as we can to do ours.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I agreed with the committee in striking out this portion of the section, mainly for the reasons given by the Senator from Illinois. They were given by him in committee, and he knows more about military affairs than I do. But it occurred to me that as we had given the Adjutant-General one hundred and thirty-eight more clerks, and had given the Surgeon-General one hundred and ninety-one more, and had given the Commissioner of Pensions eight hundred and sixteen more than he had in order to hasten up the payment of pensions and the arrears of pensions, we could allow the records to remain as they are and allow one office to be a check upon the other, so as to see whether we could not have some little check on pension claims so as to have more assurance that they go to proper claimants.

All men who claim pensions are not the foot-weary soldiers the Senator from Kansas spoke of. There have been a good many cases rejected in this Congress and a good many have been rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions; and there might be a good many more perhaps rejected if careful investigation was had. If the Adjutant-General makes a report on a certain set of facts and the Surgeon-General makes a report on a different set of facts, that would be some check, and perhaps the Commissioner of Pensions would look into it to see whether there was not something wrong about that case; but to transfer all the records of the two bureaus to one bureau, where one man has to make a report upon all the facts which now appear in the Adjutant-General's Office and the Surgeon-General's Office, would destroy one of the checks you now have in ascertaining whether a case is a fair one or not.

I am not disposed to remove any of the checks. I desire each pensioner honestly entitled to a pension to be paid, but I desire every man claiming a pension who is not entitled to it to go through all the ordeal necessary. While I am willing to furnish the means to do it as rapidly as possible, I want all the checks that now exist to prevent men not entitled to pensions from receiving them, and I hope the Committee on Pensions will devise still further means in order to see that men not entitled to them do not get them. I think the transfer of these records and the consolidation of the offices would have a tendency to remove a very important check in this direction, and therefore I agreed to strike out the clause.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is it in order to move to strike out the sixth section?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is to strike out down to the word "employed," in line 16.

Mr. ANTHONY. But is it not in order to move to strike out the whole section?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair supposes that the committee amendment can be amended; but there are other amendments to the section proposed by the committee.

Mr. ANTHONY. When the proper time comes I shall move to strike out the whole section. It gives the President and Secretary of War no authority that they do not have now, and merely imposes a legislative restraint upon their discretion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations to strike out from line 1 to line 16 of the section.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is not a motion to strike out the whole section in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not now. There are other amendments of the committee in the section. After they are disposed of a motion to strike out the whole section will be proper.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 6, line 16, after the word "that," to insert "so much of;" in line 20, after the word "and," to insert "so much of;" and in line 22, after the word "State," to insert "as may, in the judgment of the President, be available for such purposes;" so as to read:

That so much of the north half of the east wing of the State, War, and Navy building, now occupied by the War Department, except the two rooms on the second story now occupied by the Secretary of War, and so much of the fourth story, and the attic of the south wing of the said building, now occupied by the Department of State, as may, in the judgment of the President, be available for such purposes, shall be occupied by the War Department for the storage of records now stored in insecure rented buildings, and for clerical purposes connected with said records.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, line 26, after the word "the," where it occurs the second time, to strike out "corridor of the fourth story" and insert "corridors of the second and fourth stories;" in line 28, after the word "the," where it occurs the second time, to strike out "fourth story" and insert "second and fourth stories;" in line 31, after the word "the," to strike out "fourth story" and insert "second and fourth stories;" so as to read:

That the partition wall separating the corridors of the second and fourth stories of the east wing from the second and fourth stories of the south wing of the State, War, and Navy building shall be removed, so as to afford easy access from one wing to the other on the second and fourth stories of said building.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to inquire as to the necessity of making these alterations in that new public building. I do not know what effect they may have on the building. There ought to be some explanation. If we are to undertake in the Senate to make such alterations in public buildings we ought to know the reason.

Mr. ALLISON. As the bill came from the House there was an absolute direction as to how various apartments in what is known as the State, War, and Navy Department building should be occupied. We did not think that was a wise thing for us to do. Therefore we so altered the section as to give the discretion to the President. That is all we mean by the amendments. The original section required a certain portion of this building to be occupied by the Secretary of War, not only what he occupies now, except two rooms, but all the new north wing, which will be completed about the 1st of December. There is a controversy with reference to the south wing, that portion now occupied by the State Department, and also with reference to a portion of the east wing, which the Navy Department occupies. We think it wise to allow these different Secretaries to state their suggestions to the President and let him decide between them. He has that power, undoubtedly, without any legislation. So I shall not be particularly mortified if the whole section goes out.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. In addition to what the chairman has said, I will state that the committee wanted to get these rooms ready for occupation at as early a day as possible, so as to have the different bureaus move in them and save the rent paid for other buildings.

Mr. PLUMB. The remedy suggested is an appeal to Executive discretion from time to time without any act of Congress.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 6, after the word "building," in line 32, to strike out the following words:

That the occupancy of the north half of the east wing, except the two rooms aforesaid, and of the fourth story and attic of the south wing of the State, War, and Navy building by any portion of the War Department shall cease on the completion and occupancy by the War Department of the west wing and the center wing of the said State, War, and Navy building; and that thereafter the north half of the east wing and the fourth story and attic of the south wing of said building shall be controlled and occupied by the Navy Department and the Department of State, respectively.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move to strike out the whole of section 6. What do we know about the occupancy of the second story and the two rooms, and the connecting of the State Department with the War Department? It is a matter of executive administration, and we should not attempt to interfere with it.

Mr. BECK. The State Department shuts itself off so that neither the Senator nor I can get from one wing to another of the building without going out into the street and then going back into the building.

Mr. ANTHONY. I recollect proposing that question once to Mr. Fish when he was Secretary of State, and he was very strongly opposed to allowing communication. He did not wish the State Department to be connected with the other Departments and have the clerks running from one to the other. I thought his reason was very good. At all events I am willing to leave the matter to executive discretion. This is the very "mint, anise, and cumin" of legislation.

Mr. BECK. Why should a concern of that sort occupy one whole front of that great building and exclude by a wall all entrance from other parts of the building, so that nobody can get to it from there? It has rooms lying useless that the War and Navy Departments absolutely need, and the State Department can get on with less room than it has. They would take another wing if you could give it to them. I go there with very great caution and always with my hat in my hand, and I think we had better take a little of the style off that concern and let it come down to the level of the other Departments. Open the doors and use them and let it be understood that the State Department is not necessarily one of the royal family because it is carrying on diplomatic negotiations with her majesty.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the section as it now stands is satisfactory, and I think something of that kind ought to be provided for. There are now walls two or three feet thick between the State Department and the Navy Department, and I know it was a matter of complaint that winds coming from the south could not pass through there because of these walls. The Secretary of State always objected to the removing of that partition wall. My impression is that no injustice is done to the State Department by letting two of these stories be opened sufficiently to allow fresh air to pass through and have the vacant space occupied. So I do not think there is much objection to the section as amended.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am very well satisfied that if this were left entirely to the President, there would be no alteration if the Secretary of State opposed such alteration. He is the premier of the Administration, and the President will make no order in contravention of his wishes. If, therefore, it is desirable to have the change, it should be made mandatory. Under all the circumstances, perhaps it would be better to appoint a commission of nine experts to ascertain whether or not this thing shall be done. I am very well satisfied, however, if you leave it to the discretion of the President and the Secretary of State opposes it, as has been intimated by the Senator from Rhode Island, you will have no alteration, however necessary that alteration may be for the other Departments.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That part of it is mandatory I say to my friend.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island, to strike out section 6 as amended.

The motion was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out section 7, in the following words:

SEC. 7. That no part of the contingent fund appropriated by this act shall be expended in payment of clerks employed by Senators or Members of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not see why that should be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee amendments have been gone through with.

Mr. VOORHEES. I offer the following amendment. On page 56, after line 1357, insert:

For the salaries of the commissioners appointed under an act entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," approved March 22, 1882, $25,000; and the salaries of said commissioners are hereby fixed at the rate of $5,000 per annum each.

I did not suppose this would lead to any discussion, and I do not think it will when I make a single statement. As the bill here referred to originally passed it provided for the salaries at $3,000. Afterward the Senate passed a separate bill fixing these salaries at $5,000 per annum, and that bill has gone to the House where it is not likely to be reached in time to be acted upon, and hence I seek to carry out the declared will of the Senate by the amendment which I have proposed, and I do not suppose it will meet with any objection in the Senate, the Senate having passed a bill exactly similar in character.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to submit an amendment, which I attempted to do the other day without sufficient information, to correct an injustice in regard to the chiefs of divisions in the Secretary of the Treasury's Office. By one of the amendments to this bill one of the chiefs of division is practically reduced or legislated out of office. I have shown the estimates to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and will now submit a motion to insert in line 496 the words:

One chief of division of captured and abandoned property, $2,750.

Mr. Noerr, the officer in charge of that division, is one of the old officers of the Government. I do not know where he comes from; but at any rate he has received $2,750, and in the revised estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, which I hold in my hand, to conform to this law, I see it is inserted.

The fund from which this officer was paid is covered into the Treasury by the general operation of this bill, and in the revised estimates there are ten chiefs of divisions estimated for. In the bill as it stands there are but nine. You have also by this bill reduced the chief of the captured and abandoned property division from $2,750 to $2,500 by putting him in with the class of "seven chiefs of division."

I move, after the word "dollars," in line 496, to insert:

One chief of division of captured and abandoned property, $2,750.

Mr. ALLISON. I have examined the revised estimates, and if the revised estimates state the present organization of the Treasury, the Senator is right; but I suggest that instead of making a new division he simply provide for "eight chiefs of division," where the bill now provides for seven.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that probably would be well. If the Senate is not disposed to give him his former salary, that would be the proper way. This gentleman is one of the old officers, having charge of all the cotton claims. Although that money is covered into the Treasury and can only be paid out by appropriation, yet it is extremely important to retain the services of the gentleman in charge of that division, and I do not desire to reduce his pay; but if there is objection to giving him his old pay, I will adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa and move to strike out the word "seven" and insert "eight" before "chiefs of division, at $2,500 each," in line 496.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Is that not an increase? The bill is "seven."

Mr. SHERMAN. But there is under the present law a chief of captured and abandoned property, who was paid differently, paid out of one of the appropriations now covered into the Treasury. You will find in the revised estimates "ten chiefs of division."

Mr. ALLISON. As the bill now stands I understand there is one less division than the present organized force in the Treasury.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Out of what fund has that been paid heretofore?

Mr. SHERMAN. The captured and abandoned property fund. This officer also has charge of the real estate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is one of the many people we did not know anything about.

Mr. SHERMAN. I see by the revised estimates that the Secretary of the Treasury sought to meet this case and provide for a "chief of captured and abandoned property division."

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand the Senator from Ohio changes his amendment so as to strike out "seven" and insert "eight."

Mr. SHERMAN. I do that, although I think this officer ought to have $2,750. I move now to strike out "seven" and insert "eight," in line 496 so as to read "eight chiefs of division." The aggregate will have to be changed, but that can be left to a subsequent time.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like the Senator from Ohio to explain what this chief of division will have to do, what service he has to do, and why it was that heretofore it was changed?

Mr. SHERMAN. The captured and abandoned property division has charge of all property, mainly the cotton, that was captured during the war; but since that, by act of Congress, there was put upon him the custody and care of all lands of the United States other than public lands. Under the internal-revenue laws we sometimes acquire large tracts of land throughout the United States, which seemed to have no place or home, and they were placed under the custody of this gentleman as in the nature of loose property. I will say to the Senator that there has been sold each year since that appropriation was made many thousands of dollars of this property. One tract in Indiana or Illinois was sold that reached twenty or thirty thousand dollars. He has charge of all this property and all the cotton claims that arise.

Mr. COCKRELL. The money on the cotton claims has been turned into the Treasury.

Mr. SHERMAN. It has been turned into the Treasury, but claims are pending in the Court of Claims, in the Supreme Court, and in Congress, and this gentleman has charge of all the papers and makes very many reports in regard to them. We call upon him frequently for information.

Mr. HOAR. We passed a bill, I will say to the Senator, the other day authorizing the Court of Claims to hear a cotton claim amounting to $300,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The aggregate amount at the end of the paragraph will be changed, to correspond with this amendment, to $500,683.25.

Mr. ALLISON. That is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made.

Mr. FERRY. I send to the desk an amendment recommended by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and also by the Postmaster-General, whose letter I hold in my hand. On page 102, line 2495, I move to strike out "three thousand five hundred" and insert "four thousand;" so as to read:

For Third Assistant Postmaster-General, $4,000.

The First, Second, and Third Assistants have heretofore received a salary of $3,500. This bill as it stands adds $500 to the First and Second Assistants, and leaves the Third Assistant out. The Third Assistant does more work in the way of mail matter than the other two assistants combined. He has the whole charge of the financial interests of the Department; the whole $40,000,000 that come in as the postal revenues of the Government are under his supervision. He also has the management of the dead-letter and the registry system; so that his labors are really greater than the other assistants, and they all rank alike. If the Postmaster-General is away, and the First Assistant absent, and the Second Assistant, the Third Assistant takes the place, and is acting Postmaster-General. To leave the bill as it is would be an invidious discrimination against the Third Assistant, and the amendment is but an increase of $500. If the other two are to be increased in their salaries, certainly the Third Assistant Postmaster-General ought to have the same. I hold in my hand the letter of the Postmaster-General recommending it. I will not take up the time of the Senate by reading it, unless its reading is asked for.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY. I have another amendment, recommended by the Postmaster-General, in line 2548——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Wait a moment. The aggregate in line 2506 will have to be altered by striking out "214,760" and inserting "215,260," to correspond with the amendment just made.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I thought first that the question of order ought to have been raised on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, but as the chairman did not make it, I did not. Now I give notice that I mean to raise the question of order on these different amendments. That will be the shortest way to get rid of them.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The amendment had not been referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and therefore was out of order.

Mr. FERRY. I wish to disabuse the mind of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is over.

Mr. FERRY. It was recommended by a committee.

Mr. HARRIS. The amendment has been disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no question pending.

Mr. FERRY. I offer, on line 2548, to amend by inserting "four" instead of "three." There has been a reduction of the force in the office of the topographer of the Post-Office Department. The Postmaster-General was here to-day and asked me to have this amendment made so as to give the additional clerks. If it is not done the work will have to be diminished, and it really ought to be increased. Senators and members are asking for maps and work that comes within the topographic office, and it cannot be done unless they have the same number of clerks as before. This is estimated for in the Department.

Mr. ALLISON. The Postmaster-General asked me to have this correction made in line 2548. He stated to me to-day that he now has in that office four clerks of class 3, and asked me to make the correction. I stated to him that I would submit the question to the Senate, not having an opportunity of discussing it with my colleagues on the committee, and I could not say what the committee would do, but if the amendment is to be agreed to, where we have inserted "four clerks at $1,000 each" we should insert "three," and I ask unanimous consent to make that change in the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The amendment is no more in order because the chairman offers it than if any other Senator offered it.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not claim that it is.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand that, and it is not in order at all. The chairman of the Post-Office Committee, of course, has considered this subject, and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ALLISON. I have not considered it. I have stated all I know about it. The Postmaster-General states that he has now in this office four clerks of class 3, and we have given him but three.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understood the Senator to say that he favored this change and asked unanimous consent for it, and on that statement I was making——

Mr. ALLISON. I did not state whether I favored it or not.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I was stating that I would not raise the question of order under these circumstances.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, I say if that change is made, although we have agreed to "four clerks at $1,000 each," we ought to reduce the number to "three," and I must ask unanimous consent for that.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That can be done, and I will not object to the other.

Mr. ALLISON. I move, then, to insert "four clerks of class 3," in line 2548, in place of "three clerks of class 3," and where "four" is inserted, in line 2549, to change it to "three;" so as to read "three clerks at $1,000 each."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment as stated by the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. The total amount of the appropriation in line 2553 of that clause should be changed to $42,480. I move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY. I submit the following amendment, on page 108, line 2657, between the words "dollars" and "chief clerk," insert:

One law clerk, $2,500.

Mr. ALLISON. I make the point of order on that.

Mr. FERRY. I will not insist on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. FERRY. I desire to say this much, however, that we have a clerk there at $1,800 who writes all the opinions, who is sent all over the United States to attend to suits where the United States are interested, going into court and defending the United States, and he is paid but $1,800 for that work.

Mr. ALLISON. That may be, but neither the Postmaster-General nor the Attorney-General has called our attention to it.

Mr. FERRY. I did not give notice by reference in this case, and I yield to the point of order.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask unanimous consent to move an amendment in line 115 on the sixth page. By a mistake, as the chief engineer of the Senate informs me, for it must be a mistake, the text reads "three assistant engineers, at $1,440 each," when it should be "four assistant engineers;" and "conductor of elevator," in the one hundred and seventeenth and one hundred and eighteenth lines, "at $1,200," should be stricken out. The elevator has been placed under the charge of an assistant engineer and has been so for some nineteen months, and an assistant engineer has been performing these duties. He is an assistant engineer as much as the other three discharging like duties, but he is paid some $240 less. It would seem to be only just, the attention of the Senate being called to it, that the pay should be amended. Therefore I ask unanimous consent to strike out the word "three" and insert "four," in line 115; and also to strike out "conductor of elevator, $1,200," in lines 117 and 118.

Mr. ALLISON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HOAR. I move the following amendment, to follow line 2689, on page 110:

The salaries of the judges of the following district courts of the United States shall hereafter be at the rate of $5,000 per annum each, namely: the northern district of Illinois; the southern district of Illinois; the districts of Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota; the eastern district of Louisiana; the eastern district of Missouri; the three districts of New York; the southern district of Ohio; and the eastern district of Pennsylvania.

Mr. PLUMB. Is not that subject to the point of order? I raise the point of order.

Mr. HOAR. The amendment has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, authorized by them to be reported, and then by them referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I am not aware that the Committee on Appropriations make any objection to it. I do not understand that they do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On that state of facts the Chair cannot say that the point of order is properly taken if the amendment was before the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LOGAN. It was before the committee.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. PLUMB. What is the decision of the Chair on the point of order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the amendment was recommended by the Judiciary Committee and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and they did not report it, it still can be proposed as an amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. Notwithstanding it is legislation on an appropriation bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. It changes the law.

Mr. PLUMB. I made all the points of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is another thing, of course.

Mr. HOAR. We have a right to raise a salary provided for by the existing appropriation bill. It may be raised by an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is very much in favor of this amendment; but——

Mr. HOAR. I hope my friend from Kansas will withdraw his point of order.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think it is in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is clearly not in order within the rules of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the amendment be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Acting Secretary read the amendment of Mr. HOAR.

Mr. VOORHEES. Allow me to inquire of the Senator from Iowa whether he desires to conclude the bill to-night?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir; I think we can do it in a short time. It will take two or three days to prepare this bill in the Secretary's office to send it back to the House, and it is very important that it should be finished to-night.

Mr. HOAR. I wish my friend from Kansas would allow me to make a statement, and withdraw his point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas wishes to make a statement to the Senator from Kansas; does the Senator yield for that purpose?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. GARLAND. I want to say to the Senator from Kansas——

Mr. PLUMB. I shall not withdraw the point of order; I will listen to any statement.

Mr. GARLAND. I have no doubt the point of order under Rule 29 is well taken, but I wish to say to the Senator from Kansas that the Committee on the Judiciary have had a great deal of labor with this question throughout this entire session. Petitions to increase the salaries of a great many district judges came before this committee, and after considering all we had and getting before us all the responses to letters we sent out, we concluded that the district judges here named ought to be dealt with at this session of Congress before we adjourn, leaving the other judges not provided for here until the next session of Congress, when we can make general provision for them. That is the reason the committee made this report and had it sent to the Committee on Appropriations, and, for one, I should be glad if the Senator from Kansas would find it according to his duty to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Kansas will allow me now to make my statement to him, I shall be very much obliged to him.

Mr. President, there are in the commercial cities of this country district judges who have also the jurisdiction and duty of holding circuit courts, who, in the case of a war, will be the exponents and representatives of the jurisprudence of this country to the entire civilized world. Those named in this amendment are the persons who the committee found are worked all the year round. They have to decide cases of very great importance and magnitude, and their salaries are $3,500 and $4,000 only, not a fifth part of what any of these men could make in practicing law in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Chicago, or the other cities where they have jurisdiction.

I noticed that yesterday the district judge who holds court in Boston was engaged in the trial of a case of very great importance, I suppose involving many hundreds of thousands of dollars, in which the late distinguished Senator from New York, who occupied a seat in front of where the Senator from Kansas sits, was counsel. The judge is a gentleman with five children, one of them a boy studying law, one just entering college, two others a few years younger, and a daughter sixteen or seventeen years old, and without property substantially. That gentleman, the successor of Judge Peleg Sprague, has a salary of $4,000 a year. He waited upon me just before I came here on last December, saying that he would be compelled to resign his judgeship, and that he was then in search of an office to locate himself to practice law. I told him I hoped he would wait until the session of Congress was over, that the sense of Congress might be taken. Judge Choate, who was appointed for New York, a most admirable judge, resigned his seat about a year ago I think because he could not live on the salary. We pay our State judges in Massachusetts $6,000 and $6,500, and I suppose the State judges in New York are paid some $10,000 or $15,000; I do not remember now, but some very large salary; one of them, I understand from the Senator from Illinois, gets $17,000.

Now, I ask my friend from Kansas if he will not, in a matter of such great moment to these hard-worked and faithful public officers, of so great importance to this country, at least allow the Senate to express its judgment upon what is just and reasonable in this matter, and not prevent it being considered at all by a point of order? That is all I ask.

The Judiciary Committee went upon this principle: they selected those judges who appeared to them to be worked hard all the year round and made special provision for those, leaving the other district judges in the country to be considered, if they should be considered, hereafter after the passage of the bill which the Senator from Illinois has introduced, proposing that if they acted upon the new circuit court in banc, it would be ascertained how much of their time was taken, and the Congress then could determine whether any reconsideration of their salaries was necessary. We put up from $4,000 in some cases and $3,500 in others this number of judges to $5,000. Many of these judges have to travel. The judge in Kentucky, I understand, has to hold court in four different places; he has a river front of several hundred miles, with large duties in regard to internal-revenue cases that come up.

Now, I appeal to the sense of justice of my friend from Kansas whether—as two committees of the Senate have considered this question, first the Judiciary Committee selecting all this information, then the Committee on Appropriations having prepared themselves to deal with the question—it is not fair and just to allow the Senate to vote upon it.

Mr. PLUMB. Inasmuch as some appeals have been addressed to me of a personal kind, I desire to state the reason for my insisting on the point of order. In the first place I will say that I have been advised by two or three Senators on the floor that if I withdrew it they would renew it, so that on the whole my withdrawal would amount to nothing, and I would not withdraw it if I could; not that I want to act as the dog in the manger, but I believe the Committee on the Judiciary have acted on a partial, incomplete, and unsatisfactory statement of the conditions affecting the salaries and labors of the district judges throughout the United States.

The Senator from Arkansas says let this go through, and next year we will even the thing out. A bird in the hand was always "worth two in the bush" when I was a boy, and it is so now. I say the district judge of the district of Kansas—I do not speak of anybody else—is just as much entitled to $5,000 as the judge of the district of Massachusetts, about whom we have been appealed to. He not only holds the district court, but by reason of the very large country embraced in that circuit, he holds inevitably three-fourths of the time the circuit court for that circuit. He holds court at three different places in that State and travels more in going from one place to another than he would be required to travel ten times over the entire State of Massachusetts. I am not speaking about his relative ability, and I do not know anything about his ancestry, but I can say for him that he has not the advantage of having appear before him those gentlemen who have been cultivated like the Senator from Massachusetts, and consequently that ought to be counted in his favor and his salary ought to be increased on that account. He has to take the ordinary clodhopper attorney and listen to him, his dreary hum and buzz, and that probably ought to be accounted a mortification which ought to be compensated by increased salary.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Has Kansas one or two judges?

Mr. PLUMB. Kansas has one judge. I am willing to admit that $3,500 is not an adequate salary for any person who is qualified to hold a district court of the United States anywhere within the bounds of this country. But so far as the war questions are concerned we have a war out there in that country three or four times a week sometimes, and they never have war in Massachusetts; their war questions are settled. The only people we have engaged in fighting are Indians and the frontier people, and they are out there in our jurisdiction.

Mr. HOAR. And the Senators.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senators do not fight, they run. [Laughter.] I do not want to interfere with the expression of judgment of the Senate on this matter, but I desire to say, as I have a right to say, representing that district here, that the Committee on the Judiciary has not considered fairly this entire question, and I will interpose that objection, which I consider it my duty to do. I therefore raise the point of order.

Mr. HOAR. Let me say of the committee's amendment that if there is any case left out, that can be remedied by amending the amendment. The committee thought instead of taking every district judge in the country, the whole fifty-four judges, the true way was to take those who were worked all the year around on their own statement and do a full year's work instead of only a partial year's work, and make them $5,000, and then that the others would undoubtedly be dealt with when the bill of the Senator from Illinois shall pass.

Mr. PLUMB. The question whether a man works nine months or twelve varies. Some men work more rapidly than others. The district judge in Kansas does just as much work, so far as the quality of it is concerned and the quantity of it is concerned, as any man ought to do for $5,000, and more than he ought to do for $3,500.

Mr. GARLAND. I understand the Senator from Kansas insists on the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He does; and the point is well taken.

Mr. GARLAND. That being settled, I wish to call the attention of the Senator who has charge of the bill to page 2. I am inclined to offer an amendment, but I do not wish to do so if the Senator from Iowa, who has charge of the bill, will explain the matter so that we can understand it. On page 2, line 24, the Committee on Appropriations brought in the financial clerk of the Senate at a salary of $3,000. I think that is right and proper. I think also the principal executive clerk, the principal clerk, the minute and the journal clerk should be brought up to that standard also, and as a reason for that I see on page 9, lines 199 to 201, that the officers of the House similar to these that I have indicated receive a salary of $3,000.

I should like to understand the reason of that distinction between the principal clerk and principal executive clerk, and the journal and minute clerk here, and those several clerks of the House who have $3,000, while those of the Senate have but $2,500. If there is an explanation of it, I do not wish to offer an amendment. If not, I shall have to offer an amendment to make the correction.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no explanation to offer except that we have hitherto insisted that the Senate should regulate the salaries of its own employés and we have permitted the House to do the same thing with their employés. They insist that a large number of Senate employés receive salaries beyond those paid by the House of Representatives. Now, it so happens, as the Senator states, that the clerks at the desk in the House of Representatives receive more than the clerks at the desk here; but we did not feel at liberty, in view of the contest going on between the Senate and House in reference to this question of salaries, to increase the salaries of our own employés except in a very few instances, and I think we have only increased the compensation in about three instances of employés about this Capitol. We have increased the compensation of the financial clerk for the reason that, as the Senate very well knows, he has a place of great responsibility, financially and otherwise, and that he is obliged to give a large bond, is obliged to stay here every day of the year and transact the business of the Senate, and we thought under those circumstances he was entitled to an increase of compensation.

We have so adjusted this bill as to leave the whole question of compensation between the Senate and House open to an adjustment by the committee of conference. By that I do not mean to say that we wish the Senate to understand that we propose in that committee to increase the compensation of any of our own employés; but if the House of Representatives shall make the point that our employés and theirs shall be equal, then our officers at the Secretary's desk must be raised, or the officers performing like services in the House must be cut down.

Mr. GARLAND. In view of the statement made by the Senator from Iowa, I feel constrained to offer an amendment. After the words "chief clerk," on line 24, I move to insert "principal executive clerk, principal clerk, minute and journal clerk," so that it will bring the officers of this body similar to the officers of the other House to exactly the same grade and the same compensation. I am not aware that similar officers in the House perform any more labor than these here. While I recognize to the fullest extent the propriety of the amendment bringing the financial clerk up to $3,000, I think the same reason applies to these other officers, and it is a sort of self-abnegation on our part that I do not sympathize with, and in fact do not appreciate, to say that we can regulate the pay of our officers and let the House put their salaries for similar officers $500 above ours. I move that amendment, to come in on line 24, after "chief clerk:"

Principal executive clerk, principal clerk, minute and journal clerk.

Mr. ALLISON. If the point of order lies against this amendment, I make it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point does apply.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to propose this amendment from the Committee on Territories, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

On page 52, in line 1261, after the word "dollars," insert:

"Provided, That the governor, chief justice, and the speaker of the house of representatives, and the president of the council during the last session of the Legislature of the Territory of Montana shall constitute a board, who shall assemble at the capital of the Territory on the call of the governor; and such board, or a majority thereof, shall have power to organize any new county not now organized which may contain five hundred or more inhabitants, and appoint temporary officers therefor, and fix the boundaries of the same. And such board, or a majority thereof, shall reapportion the members of the council and house of representatives of said Territory upon the basis of the population as it exists at the time of their assembling as may truly appear to them from the best sources of information; and the governor shall issue notice of such apportionment, and the next Legislature shall be elected in accordance therewith, as provided by law. The members of this board shall be allowed the same compensation per diem as is allowed the presiding officers of the Legislature. All acts of this board shall be subject to the revision of the Legislative Assembly."

Mr. ALLISON. That of course is liable to a point of order, but I think it is legislation of importance, and therefore I do not feel like raising the point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. The amendment was agreed upon unanimously by the Committee on Territories. The Delegate from that Territory desires it. The situation is just this: the Legislature adjourned without making an apportionment. There must either be a called session of the Legislature at great expense, or this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa raise the point of order?

Mr. ALLISON. No, I do not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I now desire to offer the amendment which I gave notice of yesterday. On page 52, line 1262, I move to strike out the words "two thousand six hundred" and insert "three thousand five hundred."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks this proposition was voted down yesterday.

Mr. ALLISON. And I make the point of order on it now.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I think the Chair will remember that no such amendment was offered, and at the request of the Senator from Iowa I deferred the offering of it till now. Inasmuch as the law fixes the salaries of governors of Territories at $3,500 and the salaries of secretaries at $2,500, and as this bill does not——

Mr. LOGAN. That law is repealed.

Mr. MILLER, of California. No.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes.

Mr. MILLER, of California. When was it repealed?

Mr. SHERMAN. If that is the law, the amendment is in order.

Mr. MILLER, of California. It is the law, and it has never been repealed. Congress has failed to make the necessary appropriation from year to year. They have appropriated $2,600 instead of $3,500, which the law fixes as the salary of the governor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I thought the chairman raised the point of order.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I do not believe the point of order is well taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is waiting to hear a point of order.

Mr. ALLISON. I made the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. LOGAN. On page 37, line 893, I move to insert:

Provided, That the maximum salary of gaugers shall not exceed $6 per diem.

Mr. ALLISON. Under the direction of the committee I am bound to raise the point of order, although I agree with the Senator from Illinois about the propriety of it; $5 a day is the pay now by law.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to state to the Senate that we have had a committee of gaugers here, and they have been examined, and they show this to be the fact: the maximum now is $5 per diem, and they only get that provided they gauge that quantity of spirits. Sometimes they gauge beyond it, so that their salaries would amount to $20 or $25 a day if they were allowed pay for all their gauging.

Sometimes they go for days and days when they have no work to perform. In the city where I live—and I presume it is so in all the other cities where there are great distilleries—the very best class of men are selected for this position, men who can be relied on, men who are recognized and known as men of character and integrity, and the fact that they are engaged only a portion of the time gives them a very small pittance in the way of pay. They said that if it was raised to $6 per diem with the average that it made it would give them a living salary. It was recommended by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and I hope there will be no objection to it, and that the amendment will be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. BECK. The chairman of the committee made the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not hear it. If the Chair had he would have stopped the Senator from Illinois, because of course the point of order is well taken.

Mr. PLUMB. I now move on page 86, line 2093, to strike out "twenty" and insert "sixteen," so as to reduce the appropriation for rent of the Pension-Office building to $16,000, and in line 2096 to strike out "twenty" and insert "sixteen."

Mr. ALLISON. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to the fact that I have received a letter to-day from the Secretary of the Interior asking me to insert "and for rent of other buildings." He states that he should like to have this total amount for other rents.

Mr. PLUMB. I am entirely content with that; but I want the rent for the one building made $16,000.

Mr. ALLISON. Then add "and for rent for other buildings, $4,000."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I now move, in line 2088, to make the clause read "for the rent of a suitable building or buildings for the use of the Pension Office, to be selected by the Secretary of the Interior, $16,000," so as not to specify any building at all. That I state is in accordance with the wish of the Secretary himself, and as he believes will tend to economy.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. After the word "Interior," in line 2092, I move to strike out the words "may select."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY. I understood the Senator from California [Mr. MILLER] to have moved an amendment to this bill to carry out the salary fixed for the governor of Arizona. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations made a point of order that because he asked for an increase of salary to conform to the salary fixed by law—was that the point?

Mr. ALLISON. It increases the appropriation.

Mr. FERRY. Then the point of order is not well taken. I will read the rule:

27. All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, except bills making appropriations for rivers and harbors, which shall be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Now here is the point:

And no amendment shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law.

The law fixes the salary at $3,500, but the appropriation is only $2,600. Now, the Senator proposes to raise the appropriation to the salary according to existing law. The point is not well taken.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that the law relating to the salaries of governors of Territories in the Revised Statutes has been repealed. Of course I cannot turn to it just now.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I should like the Senator to show the repealing act. He cannot find any such thing.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Every appropriation bill that has been passed since 1876——

Mr. MILLER, of California. That law is not repealed. There has merely been a failure of Congress to appropriate the money.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What statute does the amendment come under?

Mr. MILLER, of California. Section 1845:

From and after the 1st day of July, 1873, the annual salaries of the governors of the several Territories shall be $3,500, and the salaries of the secretaries shall be $2,500 each.

Mr. HALE. Now, if the Senator will examine the act whereby the salaries of these governors were reduced he will find that it is there provided that thenceforward the salary of the governor should be at the amount fixed in the appropriation bill.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Please show me that statute; I cannot find it.

Mr. ALLISON. I will read the appropriation bill of last year appropriating for these identical salaries:

That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full compensation for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, for the objects hereinafter expressed, namely:

Then section 4 provides:

That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent or in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. FERRY. That does not repeal the law.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It has been in every appropriation bill for five or six years.

Mr. FERRY. That applies to the current year. That does not repeal the law. It simply applies to that year. For instance, this year the appropriation from the committee might have been $3,500, and then it would have been proper. The law stands, and the amendment offered by the Senator from California is certainly in order. I hope the Senator will renew it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The law as read by the Senator from California fixes the salaries of these officers at $3,500. Now, unless that has been repealed his amendment is in order.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I renew the amendment.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The law read by the Senator from Iowa repealed that law, and you cannot repeal a law for one as intimated by the Senator from Michigan.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not repeal the law fixing salaries unless it so specifically states.

Mr. RANSOM. Does the Chair hold that the clause in the appropriation just read by the Senator from Iowa suspends the law for a year and does not repeal it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let it be read again. It fixes the salary. Will the Senator from Iowa read the law?

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Massachusetts has it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair wishes to see the state of the law on the subject, and then he will decide quickly.

Mr. DAWES. The enacting clause is in these words:

That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full compensation for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, for the objects hereinafter expressed, namely.

Then the fourth section of the act is—

That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent or in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator send that to the Chair?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair holds that this is a very improper way of repealing a general law, but it is repealed. Congress can repeal by an appropriation bill as well as in anything else. The salaries of these governors were fixed at $3,500 for a number of years; the salaries of judges were fixed at $3,000; and the Chair for a number of years complained very bitterly about that; but it was held by the Senate that year by year they appropriated so and so. The act says:

That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full compensation for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, for the objects hereinafter expressed, namely.

The governors by this act were paid $2,600; and it provided further:

That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent or in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

This statute is in conflict with the provision as to the salaries of governors. The Chair decides that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think we can get through with this bill to-night, and therefore I move an adjournment.

Mr. ALLISON. Let us try for a few minutes longer.

Mr. COCKRELL. Very well.

Mr. MORGAN. By direction of the Committee on Public Lands, I offer the following amendment on page 87——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I appeal to the chairman of the committee. I want to submit to him—of course I shall be governed by what he says—had we not better adjourn and finish this bill to-morrow?

Mr. ALLISON. If it is the judgment of members of the committee that we had better adjourn, I shall not press the matter.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. GARLAND. I wish before adjournment to offer a resolution to lie over:

Resolved, That on and after the 3d of July next the hour of meeting of the Senate during the present session shall be eleven o'clock a. m.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let that go over.

ASSISTANT POSTMASTER OF THE SENATE.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the compensation of the assistant postmaster of the Senate shall be $2,238 per annum, to date from the 1st day of July, 1882.

ADJOURNMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama had the floor and was offering an amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from Alabama will yield for an adjournment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 1382) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at six o'clock and sixteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 29, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

FORT ABERCROMBIE MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. WASHBURN. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 1432) abolishing the military reservation of Fort Abercrombie, in the State of Minnesota, and authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to have the lands embraced therein made subject to homestead and pre-emption entry and sale the same as other public lands, for present consideration.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. WASHBURN. While the Clerk is looking for the bill I will state for the information of the House that this is a proposition to restore to the public domain——

Mr. HOLMAN. The right to object is reserved.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN] asks by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present action the bill (S. No. 1432) abolishing the military reservation of Fort Abercrombie, in the State of Minnesota, and authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to have the lands embraced therein made subject to homestead and pre-emption entry and sale the same as other public lands.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to any bill which proposes to extend the provisions of the pre-emption laws. If the gentleman strikes that part out I will not object.

Mr. WASHBURN. A word of explanation will satisfy the gentleman from Indiana. This was formerly a military reservation. It was turned over by the War Department, or rather it was restored to the public domain, about eleven years ago. In the mean time it has been settled and taken up by homesteads. An exactly similar bill has been reported by the Committee on Public Lands of this House; a bill precisely the same as this bill which has been passed by the Senate. It simply restores to the public domain this reservation which was abandoned long and long ago. There is no reason in the world why it should not be subject to the same conditions as the balance of the public domain in our State.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the Secretary of War recommend this?

Mr. WASHBURN. He recommended it in the last Congress. I was on the Committee on Public Lands in the last Congress, and the bill was submitted to him, and he recommended it. He stated that the reservation had been abandoned for military purposes, and was turned over to the Interior Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman is willing to strike out the pre-emption feature I have no objection. I object to the continuance of a law under which frauds are being perpetrated every day and in conflict with the homestead law.

Mr. WASHBURN. I am ready to strike it out.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the military reservation of Fort Abercrombie, in the State of Minnesota, be, and the same is hereby, abolished; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to have the lands embraced therein made subject to town site, homestead, and pre-emption entry and sale the same as other public lands: Provided, That the rights of all actual settlers entitled to the benefits of the homestead and pre-emption laws of the United States, who now occupy in good faith any portion of the land embraced within said reservation, shall date from the day of their actual settlement thereon; and in perfecting their titles thereto, under the homestead or pre-emption laws, the time such settlers have occupied and improved their said lands shall be allowed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to taking the bill from the Speaker's table for present consideration?

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to say a word while retaining the right to object.

Mr. WASHBURN. I have no objection, and will move to strike out the word "pre-emption" wherever it occurs.

Mr. PAGE. I do not wish to interfere with the gentleman's bill, but the word "pre-emption" should be in it. There is no reason why these lands should not be subject to the same conditions as other public lands.

Mr. HOLMAN. I was going to add, reserving the right to object, that there is trouble in applying the principle of homestead exclusively to lands which have been long reserved where the country has been settled and the lands largely increased in value. Perhaps the true rule is to provide for the sale of the lands. I think in all other cases the homestead principle should be applied to every acre of the public domain. I think Congress is making a great mistake in allowing any public land to be sold under the pre-emption laws or any other way. We have reached the point when the principle of the homestead law should be applied to every acre of the public lands.

I concede in the case of the lands withdrawn for settlement for years and the country around has been settled up, there is difficulty in applying the principle. I ask the gentleman from Minnesota whether it would not be juster to the Government, inasmuch as none of these are valid claims, to provide for the sale of these lands. I am not familiar with the surrounding country and the extent to which these lands have been increased in value by other people to know what properly should be done, but I insist that word "pre-emption" shall be stricken out.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I desire to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN] whether it has been considered by any committee of this House?

Mr. WASHBURN. It was considered by the Committee on Public Lands and unanimously reported to this House.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I ask that the report of the committee be read.

Mr. SPRINGER. Before the objection is withdrawn I wish to state that I have received a letter from some settlers in Western Minnesota in regard to some bill of this kind, but I cannot put my hand on it, protesting against the passage of that bill, if it is the same bill.

Mr. WASHBURN. This is not the same bill.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Let the report of the committee be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill H. R. No. 819, having had the same under consideration, report:

That this bill has for its purpose the restoration to the public domain of that portion of the military reservation of Fort Abercrombie in the State of Minnesota, and also authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to have the lands embraced therein made subject to homestead and pre-emption entry and sale, the same as other public lands.

Your committee find this reservation has been abandoned for military purposes for a long time; and the Secretary of War, in answer to the inquiries of the Public Lands Committee of the Forty-sixth Congress on this subject, said "that the reservation was relinquished to the care and control of the Interior Department by the War Department March 25, 1871."

In answer to an inquiry of your committee, the Secretary of the Interior transmits the opinion of the Commissioner of the General Land Office in regard to this bill, in which the Commissioner says:

"Inasmuch as the town of McCauleyville is known to be situated upon a portion of the lands to be affected by this bill, I would suggest that the lands be made subject to entry under the town-site as well as the homestead and pre-emption laws."

Your committee see no reason why the lands embraced in this reservation should not be subject to the same terms of entry and sale as other lands in the State; and, in order to render the bill complete in this respect, recommend that it be amended by the insertion of the word "town-site" in the sixth line of bill as printed, so that the sentence shall read: "And the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to have the lands embraced therein made subject to town-site, homestead, and pre-emption entry, and sale, the same as other public lands." Believing it to be the true policy of the Government to afford every facility for the opening up and settlement of the public lands, your committee would therefore recommend the passage of this bill as above amended.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Minnesota whether the bill conforms to the suggestions of the Department in all its provisions?

Mr. WASHBURN. It does, sir.

Mr. STRAIT. It was considered by the Committee on Public Lands and unanimously recommended by them.

Mr. HOLMAN. There will be no objection if the clause in reference to pre-emption is stricken out. It occurs, I believe, three times in the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN. I move to amend the bill by striking out the word "pre-emption" wherever it occurs in the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that the title be amended to conform thereto.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be amended.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ROBESON. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. HOUSE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar and put upon its passage the bill (H. R. No. 3207)——

Mr. ROBESON. As the time for closing the general debate upon the naval appropriation bill is fixed by a positive order of the House, I feel it due to both sides of the House to call for the regular order.

Mr. HOUSE. This will not take two minutes. I hope the gentleman from New Jersey will withhold his demand for the regular order until this bill can be passed.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I have risen to a privileged question, and claim the right to hold the floor.

Mr. HOUSE. I hope the gentleman from New Jersey will withhold his demand, as this will take but a moment.

Mr. ROBESON. I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

BRIDGE OVER THE CUMBERLAND RIVER.

Mr. HOUSE. Then I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar the bill to which I have referred and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections to its present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 3207) giving the assent of Congress to the mayor and city council of Nashville, Tennessee, to construct a free bridge over the Cumberland River.

The bill was read. It is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the assent of Congress be, and the same is hereby, given to the mayor and city council of Nashville, Tennessee, to construct a free bridge over the Cumberland River at some convenient point between the former city of Edgefield and the city of Nashville: Provided, That the navigation of said river shall not be obstructed thereby.

The Committee on Commerce recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

Strike out, after the word "provided," in the seventh line, the words "that the navigation of said river shall not be obstructed thereby" and insert in lieu thereof "that the plan and location of said bridge shall first be submitted to the Secretary of War, and be by him approved as a proposed bridge that will not obstruct, impair, nor injuriously modify the navigation of the Cumberland River, due regard being had to the character of said navigation and to the bridges already built."

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOUSE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TEMPORARY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Appropriations. I am directed by the committee to report the following joint resolution, and ask that it be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 248) to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government.

Be it resolved, &c., That all appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government under existing law which shall remain unprovided for on the 30th day of June, 1882, be, and they are hereby, continued and made available for a period of fifteen days from and after that date, unless the regular appropriations therefor, provided for in bills now pending in Congress, shall have been previously made for the services of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883; and in case the appropriations or any of them hereby continued are or is insufficient to carry on the said necessary operations, a sufficient amount is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to carry on the same: Provided, That no greater amount shall be expended therefor than will be in the same proportion to the appropriations for the fiscal year 1882 as fifteen days' time bears to the whole of said fiscal year: Provided further, That authority is also granted for continuing during the same period the necessary work required for public printing and binding, and for all other miscellaneous objects embodied in the sundry civil and naval appropriation acts in advance of the appropriations to be hereafter made for said objects: And provided further, That all sums expended under this act shall be charged to and deducted from appropriations for like services for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HISCOCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF NATIONAL-BANK CHARTERS.

Mr. CRAPO. I rise to make a privileged motion. I move that the House insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4167) to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. CRAPO of Massachusetts, Mr. DINGLEY of Maine, and Mr. BUCKNER of Missouri.

CONTESTED ELECTION—SMALLS VS. TILLMAN.

Mr. WAIT. I rise to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Elections in the contested-election case of Smalls vs. Tillman, from the fifth Congressional district of South Carolina. The gentlemen who represent the minority are not present, but I know that they desire that their views shall be printed with the report of the majority of the committee. I ask the Clerk to read the resolution reported by the majority.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That George D. Tillman was not elected as a Representative to the Forty-seventh Congress from the fifth Congressional district of South Carolina, and is not entitled to retain the seat he now occupies in this House.

Resolved, That Robert Smalls was duly elected as a Representative from the fifth Congressional district of South Carolina to the Forty-seventh Congress, and is entitled to his seat as such.

Mr. WAIT. I ask that the resolutions reported on behalf of the minority prepared by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. DAVIS,] with whom I have conferred as to presenting them at this time, be also read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Robert Smalls was not elected as a Representative to the Forty-seventh Congress of the United States from the fifth Congressional district of South Carolina, and is not entitled to occupy a seat as such.

Resolved, That George D. Tillman was duly elected as a Representative from the fifth Congressional district of South Carolina, and is entitled to retain his seat as such.

The SPEAKER. The report of the Committee on Elections, together with the views of the minority, will be ordered to be printed, and will be laid over.

WATER SUPPLY OF WASHINGTON CITY.

Mr. NEAL. I present the report of the committee of conference on Senate bill No. 1723.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill of the Senate No. 1723, to increase the water supply in the city of Washington, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective House, as follows:

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House numbered 1, providing for a fish-way at the Great Falls of the Potomac, and they also agree to recommend the following as a substitute for the amendment numbered 2 of the said bill:

"That one-half the cost of said improvement, excluding the fish-way, shall be annually computed and stated by the Treasurer of the United States and charged to a capital account on the books of the Treasury, and that interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum thereon shall be annually computed and charged to said account, and that any surplus of water-rents over and above the expenses of maintaining the works and appendages and paying the charges for interest and sinking fund for the redemption of outstanding bonds heretofore issued for the extension of said water-works in the city of Washington shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States by the officer who may be charged with the collection of the same, and credited to the account thus created until the same shall be finally extinguished, and the water-rents shall be so regulated from time to time as to be at least sufficient to pay the expenses of maintaining the said works and appendages and the interest on the capital account created in accordance with this provision in addition to charges now imposed thereon by law. After the extinguishment of said account, and until further action by Congress, the surplus water-rents shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States."

HENRY S. NEAL,
MILTON G. URNER,
ABRAM S. HEWITT,
Conferees on the part of the House.
ISHAM G. HARRIS,
A. P. GORMAN,
Conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask to be heard on this matter.

Mr. NEAL. I move the previous question on agreeing to the report of the conference committee.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the previous question will not be ordered. The report is in violation of the vote of this House.

Mr. NEAL. There will be time for debate after the previous question is ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 55, noes 32.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point being made that a quorum has not voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. NEAL, and the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HOLMAN.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think time would be saved by allowing some debate. There is no occasion for hurrying this matter.

Mr. ATKINS. Has it been agreed by the House that the time occupied by this matter shall not be taken out of the time allowed for the discussion on the naval bill?

The SPEAKER. There has been no extension of time for the debate on the naval bill.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope that by unanimous consent as much additional time will be allowed for general debate on the naval bill as has been occupied from the reading of the Journal till now, and as shall be occupied till we take up the naval bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think this bill should not be forced through without debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit hereafter the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee. The Chair will now state that if the previous question is ordered on the report of the committee of conference there is one-half hour allowed for debate.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to make a suggestion. The matter is not well understood by the House. No explanation has been made by the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. This is not debatable. Gentlemen will pass between the tellers.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw this report for the present.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. The House is dividing.

Before the result of the vote by tellers was announced,

Mr. NEAL said: A quorum has not yet voted, and with the consent of the House I will withdraw the report until a quorum is present.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the regular order.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York, rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] states that he rises to a question of privilege.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I ask the Clerk to read the extracts I have marked in the RECORD of this morning.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I have an amendment I desire to offer. I claim the right to be heard——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not now in order.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I wish to be heard——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot be heard and is not in order at this time.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Will it be in time after the previous question is ordered to offer an amendment?

The SPEAKER. It will not.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I have an amendment to offer which I have the right to present——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana demands the previous question upon the adoption of the report.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I call for the yeas and nays upon that motion. This is an effort to stifle American sentiment.

The SPEAKER, (rapping with his gavel.) The gentleman from New York is not in order.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I will be heard in time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is not in order, and must be seated.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I now respectfully repeat to the Chair that I will be heard in order. This is an effort to stifle all American sentiment, and I will not submit to it. I insist upon——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that he is not at liberty to defy the House and the Chair by saying he will be heard contrary to the rules.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I will be heard in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will resume his seat. The Sergeant-at-Arms will see that the gentleman is seated.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must be seated.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I have a right to be heard when I am in order.

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will require the gentleman to resume his seat if he persists in speaking out of order.

* * * * * * * *

The SPEAKER. The gentleman stated that he would be heard, as the Chair understands, in defiance of the Chair.

* * * * * * * *

The gentleman from New York now qualifies his statement and says he will be heard in order; but his first declaration was that he would be heard in spite of the Chair.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. The Chair has misunderstood me. I did not say that. I claimed the right to be heard in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was proceeding out of order. The gentleman from New York demands the yeas and nays upon ordering the previous question.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Now, Mr. Speaker, if I can get your attention and the attention of the House for two minutes, I think it will be for the benefit of the order and tend to expediting business in this House, if I am heard without interruption.

I stated yesterday, and I meant what I said, that I would to-day bring up a resolution impeaching Mr. Lowell. I shall have a word to say upon that, when I get through with this matter, which altogether will not take more than two or three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. In regard to what has been read from the RECORD, I wish to say here that the Speaker himself will now see that he did me injustice, as he did on a former occasion when there was a controversy between the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] and myself, arising from a misunderstanding which the Speaker did not explain, and which if explained would have prevented that controversy. And although I think I suffered great injustice by that report in the RECORD going into history, I did not rise to correct it as I have done in this case.

The Speaker will see, from the report in the RECORD which has been read, that yesterday I rose and asked for the yeas and nays, and in a kind of undertone said something else of no importance, such as other gentlemen frequently say without objection. What I rose for was to call for the yeas and nays, and the Speaker said that I was not in order.

By and by I rose and said that I rose to a parliamentary question. The Speaker said: "The gentleman from New York is not in order, and the Sergeant-at-Arms will see him seated." I tried to get the question before the Speaker, but I could not be heard, and the second time he called upon the very benevolent Sergeant-at-Arms, (who I see is now watching me, perhaps for the purpose of laying hands on me.) [Laughter.] The second time the Speaker called upon the Sergeant-at-Arms without any provocation on my part, except proposing to ask a parliamentary question.

Then, when the Speaker began to explain, he stated that I had said that I would be heard in defiance of the Chair and the House. Now, I refer the Speaker to the report which is in the RECORD, and which shows no such thing.

The first thing I said was, that I would be heard in time. Then I said I would be heard in order, all through violating no rule of this House, only trying to say something, the same as other gentlemen are indulged in doing every day.

I have no more to say upon that point. I ask for no censure; I leave it, Mr. Speaker, to your own good sense and judgment whether it was fair, upon a former occasion to which I could refer, or upon the present occasion, that whenever I rise to say something upon a question which I consider of more importance than anything we have been discussing here, the Sergeant-at-Arms, in defiance of his own good intentions toward me, is perpetually set upon me. [Laughter.] That is all I have to say upon that point.

One word more and I have done. I made a threat yesterday which I intended to carry out, and which I could carry out by raising the question of a quorum on all occasions, and insisting upon everything being read that was in order to be read. Somebody yesterday got rather the advantage of me on that point, but that will not occur again. I could make a great deal of delay in that way.

Now, I have only this to say: on reconsidering the matter, considering the pressure of business in the House, the bill now pending and other matters of more importance, if I should move to impeach Mr. Lowell it would take up a great deal of time; even if you ruled me out of order all the time it might take a long while before I would consider myself out of order. [Laughter.]

I desire to say that the resolution which I first introduced six months ago is the only one which should have been adopted by this House, and if it had been adopted then it would have saved a great deal of time and preserved the credit of the nation. That resolution required the President of the United States to make a demand under the law of 1868 for the immediate release of our citizens from jail, and then to report the proceedings to Congress for our action.

I have now made up my mind not to block legislation in the way I intended, but to leave the matter until we see what action shall be taken under this vigorous resolution—not quite so vigorous as it ought to be, but still a pretty vigorous resolution for this House to adopt—offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] yesterday. I therefore desire to say that I will not object to any one getting unanimous consent, and will not insist upon a quorum on all occasions for the transaction of business. [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that he did not intentionally do the gentleman from New York any injustice. Taking what had been privately stated on yesterday to the Chair by the gentleman from New York, together with what was said by the gentleman, and which is correctly quoted from the RECORD, the Chair thinks that when the gentleman insisted upon proceeding to make a speech after he was called to order, it was its duty, not to itself, but to the House, that the gentleman should be warned that he could not proceed, as he was doing after the previous question had been moved, in violation of the rules. If there was any injustice in that the Chair certainly did not intend it.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ROBESON. I move that the morning hour for the call of committees be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] asks that the time for general debate on the naval appropriation bill be extended, to make up for the time which has been occupied in other business this morning.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask that the time for general debate be extended till three o'clock.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. One hour has not been occupied in other business.

The SPEAKER. Fifty minutes.

Mr. ATKINS. Well, let the extension be for fifty minutes.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the time for general debate will be extended for fifty minutes.

There was no objection.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ROBESON. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, (Mr. PAGE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6616) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HARRIS,] who held the floor when the committee rose yesterday, has forty minutes remaining.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusettss, addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I desire at the outset, Mr. Chairman, to express my thanks to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] for the courtesy of allowing me to defer the delivery of my remarks from yesterday till to-day. But I am sure he will be as sorry as I am that his courtesy has been in vain, for I feel less able to-day to engage in this discussion than I was yesterday.

Mr. ROBESON. As the gentleman from New York is not well, I hope order will be preserved in the House, so we may hear his voice.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I do not know I will be able to speak in any voice, but I shall make the effort. I think the House, Mr. Chairman, has some reason to find fault with the Committee on Appropriations for the delay which has taken place in reporting this bill. If the bill is intended only to support the Navy and to carry on its current operations, there could have been no reason why it should have been delayed until the last week of the fiscal year. If, on the other hand, the bill was intended for general legislation in addition to providing for the ordinary course of expenditure, then the House certainly has a grievance that it comes in at the very tail of the session, when no opportunity is afforded for the consideration of these general provisions, or for determining the effect they are going to have on the future of the Navy.

My own conclusion is, it must have been withheld for the latter reason. I find in it provisions of a very extraordinary nature which have never been in any naval appropriation bill at any time within my memory.

To two of these items I propose to give some attention. The first is the provision for beginning the construction of two new vessels of war. The second is the provision for the completion of the monitors.

Those who will read the bill attentively will find there is a very curious distinction made in the bill between the appropriations for these two purposes. In reference to building the new vessels the language is that the Secretary may use the money. There is no obligation imposed on him. The provision is permissive. While in regard to the completion of the monitors the language is that he shall expend a million of dollars, which is appropriated for their completion. This provision is mandatory and not permissive.

Now, whether this be accident or design, it seems to me that it gives the key to the delay which has taken place in reporting this bill and to the peculiar provisions of the bill. In other words, this is a bill designed in fact to secure the completion of the monitors.

THE MONITORS.

I have no wish to enter into a history of those vessels. The humiliating story has often been told. What I desire to do is to call attention to a very extraordinary fact in the history of these monitors which is brought out by the provisions of this bill, and which shows that they have no legal existence, and that the effect of this appropriation is for the first time to give them a legal recognition.

The monitors existed in 1874. They were live vessels. No suggestion was ever made from any quarter I can discover, and I have endeavored to read every line referring to this transaction—no suggestion was ever made except for the repair of these monitors. The Secretary of the Navy refers to them in his annual report of 1874–'75, and again in his annual report of 1875–'76; and in both cases he speaks of the repairs of these monitors. In the investigation which took place in the Forty-fourth Congress the Secretary made a personal statement before the committee, and in that statement, as I have read it from beginning to end and many times, in defense of his action in regard to these monitors it was always put upon the ground of repairs. There is no suggestion anywhere in any official report, either of the Secretary or of any head of bureau, that any new vessels were to be built.

The question for which the Secretary was called to account, if I may be permitted to use the language, in the Forty-fourth Congress, was whether he was justified in using old materials of the Navy for the repair of these monitors, not in the navy-yards of the United States, for about that there was no controversy, but in the ship-yards of contractors. I will do the Secretary the justice to say in his statement he expressed grave doubts as to whether he had any such authority. He says he consulted the Committee on Appropriations, and the evidence shows that he did so; and there the question is always, may the old material be used for the repair of vessels which are to be repaired in private navy-yards and not in the navy-yards of the United States?

The Secretary took that authority. My own opinion is it was unlawful, but nevertheless it was the exercise of a discretion which if properly exercised could have done no harm to the public interest, and I should be the last man to call him to account for the exercise of authority in excess of the law which he thought he had and which was intended for the public good.

Now, bearing in mind that repair was the object of the transactions which have resulted in giving us these five monitors now to dispose of, here comes a very remarkable fact as to one of these vessels unquestionably, and as to the others probably, but in what I say now I shall refer only to monitor Puritan, now in the dock of Mr. John Roach, at Chester.

In his report of 1874 Secretary Robeson says:

Of the iron-clad or armored vessels sixteen are of a class and in condition for actual and efficient service. Four of the class of powerful double-turreted monitors are actually in hand undergoing repairs, and the fifth is well worth the same attention. [Note—The fifth was the Puritan.] But the remainder may be counted as really useless for any actual or efficient purpose.

Now, the Secretary sits in his office and accepts, as in the very nature of things he must accept, as facts the reports of his heads of bureaus. So I turn to the report of Mr. Isaiah Hanscom, dated December 3, 1874, to the Secretary, and from which undoubtedly the Secretary himself made up his report, and find:

As yet no work has been done to the Puritan, owing to the want of funds; but a design is being prepared to make that vessel a powerful iron-clad with a high rate of speed, to be armed with four 10-inch rifled guns, to be heavily plated, &c.

Now, let it be remembered that this was December 3, 1874, on the very day when the letter of Mr. Hanscom to Mr. John Roach, or Mr. Roach to Mr. Hanscom—I forget the exact order, but for the present purpose it is immaterial—in regard to the Puritan is dated.

Now we come to the report of 1875–'76, and in this the Secretary says, under the head of "iron-clads:"

Five of them—

That, of course, means the other four and the Puritan, namely, the double-turreted monitors Amphitrite, Monadnock, Miantonomoh, and the Terror—are in process of complete repair,—

Note the word "repair;" under repair always until the pending bill, which now for the first time provides for their completion as new vessels—requiring from four to six months to finish.

And I may state, in passing, that there is a strange discrepancy in regard to the time that is allowed for the completion of this work between the head of the bureau and the statement of the contractor, Mr. Roach, who names eighteen months in his letter to the head of that bureau. But there is no evidence to show that the Secretary knew anything of the correspondence between Mr. Hanscom and Mr. Roach.

Now, in the report of Mr. Hanscom, which bears date November 17, 1875, a few days before the report of the Secretary, he says:

Plans for alteration and repair of the Puritan have been prepared by the bureau and her repairs have been commenced.

Now, remember, the official statement that the Puritan was under repair is here made on the 17th day of November, 1875. This statement appears not only in the report of the head of the bureau but in the report of the Secretary of the Navy himself. Now what was the fact? The Puritian, at the time when this report was written, and for several months afterward, was not at Chester at all in the yard of Mr. John Roach, but was lying at League Island, and had never been away from League Island. The order for its removal was not given until January 29, 1876, and it was not delivered at Chester until February 3, 1876.

Yet here is the head of a bureau informing the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary believing in his head of bureau, as he ought to have done, informs the President and the President informs Congress that repairs are going on upon the Puritan in the yard of John Roach at Chester, when the Puritan was at League Island, twenty miles off, and not one particle of work had ever been done upon her in the way of repair. I believe that the Secretary was deceived. I have known him too long and too well to believe that he would have informed Congress and the country that a ship, upon which nothing had been done, was under repairs when the ship being built from the hull up was in one place and the ship said to be under repair was twenty miles distant in another place. I have referred to this fact, Mr. Chairman, for only one reason.

I want this House to understand how dangerous is the system which allows the public money to be expended by the heads of bureaus, responsible to no one except to the Secretary of the Navy, who from the very nature of the case must take their word as true; and who, being a civilian, is not expected and cannot know the nature of the work going on in the various navy-yards of the country. That same Secretary who was thus deceived, hood-winked, bamboozled—for there is no other word for it—by his head of bureau, Mr. Isaiah Hanscom, now brings a bill in here and asks us to appropriate money to finish this identical ship among others; that is to say, it may be one, for the Secretary has the right of selection, and being so he will most probably take the Puritan as one of those to be finished under this bill. I say this gentleman brings in a bill without one single safeguard provided against the waste and expenditure of the public money under a similar condition of affairs which may arise at any time. That is the moral I want to draw from this history of the monitors. I confirm every word that has been said by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs in regard to the importance of interposing between the Secretary and heads of bureaus the supervisory board, that shall take charge of the expenditures for the Navy Department. My purpose then to-day, and it is my sole purpose, for I would not revive these scandals for any mere personal annoyance, but I revive them only now in the public interest, that it shall be made impossible for any head of a bureau, honest or dishonest, to deceive the Secretary of the Navy so that he will be put into the humiliating attitude of saying to Congress that a ship is under repair at one place, when the facts of the matter are that it is twenty miles distant in a different yard, and no work being done upon it at all, while an entirely new ship is being built somewhere else.

VALUE OF THE MONITORS.

No safeguard is provided, then, against the wasteful expenditure of this money. Whether these monitors were, as I believe, conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity, or whether they are the fruit of lawful commerce between the contractors and the Navy Department, which I do not believe, nevertheless we have got the ships; we have paid three millions and a half of the public money on them; we are invited to spend four millions and a half more to finish them; and the question is presented to us as intelligent Representatives whether we had better throw away the money which has been expended, or cast good money after bad and lose that also. If these ships will be good ships, valuable ships, such as my friend, the chairman of the committee, would recommend this Congress to build after his years of patient study of these questions, after his honorable service in this House, to which I wish to bear testimony—if they are such monitors as he, with his judgment, founded upon the experience of the best minds in the Navy, will recommend this House to build, then I say let us appropriate the money for building them. But if they are of even doubtful utility they ought not to be finished, because four million and a half of dollars will give us two or three of those swift cruisers of which the gentleman has been speaking this morning, and in the importance of which I absolutely agree with him. They will give us two of those mighty rams that will run down any ship that may seek to enter our harbors.

Therefore take the money, if we are going to spend it, and let us cease to cry over spilled milk; let us use this money in doing some good work which will satisfy the just expectations of the country. For a navy we want, and a navy this country will always have. But, as I said the other day, it is a real navy and not a sham navy that the people of this country want. They are willing to wipe out the past; they are willing to forgive the men who have wasted their money, lawfully or unlawfully. But they say to us here, "Let there be an end to this business; now, go to work and give us a navy." And I go hand in hand with my friend, the chairman of the committee, in his efforts. They have been most intelligent. We owe him a debt of gratitude for the manner in which he has pursued this business from the beginning to the end, and for that vast amount of testimony, most valuable and most suggestive, which he has taken in the course of this investigation. And if I intervened at any point in this matter, I want him to understand now that it was not my purpose to obstruct him but to help him.

From the study I had given the subject I saw there was not information enough for this House to proceed intelligently to pass upon the bill of the chairman of the committee for which he wished to secure discussion; I say there is not information enough now. There remain questions to be answered which I have formulated in a resolution of the gravest consequence before we act intelligently on that bill which he has drawn up so carefully with safeguards which receive my approbation, and which are in striking contrast to the total absence of safeguards in this bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Now, how do the Appropriations Committee bolster up, so to speak, in this House the recommendation which they make as to the completion of these monitors in their report which I hold in my hand?

Mr. ATKINS. If it will not interrupt the gentleman I should like to ask him, at the point he is at now, what would he do with these ships if he would not finish them?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I know the gentleman asks the question in good faith.

Mr. ATKINS. I do.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. If they are not going to make such ships, the best possible ships, such as we want in this country, I would sell them for old iron and begin again. But if they are good ships, such as we want, I would go on and finish them. But I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that I disclaim entirely to speak as an expert in this business. I have not so spoken. I am only studying this subject, as I said the other day. But in my opinion the best use to be made of the money proposed to be expended on these monitors would be to build entirely new ships of the type most approved by the best minds of the country, proceeding on the knowledge we have got and the recent experience of other nations.

One would infer from this report that this application of money to finish the monitors was approved by three parties; first, the Secretary of the Navy, Mr Chandler, who writes a letter recommending it. So far as I know, this is his first official act. I cannot say it is a very good beginning. I have great respect for the Secretary of the Navy, for his ability, and, when he knows his business, for his capacity to do work. I have experienced it myself in other spheres of action. No man ever did more faithful work for his party than he did in 1876; and if he does as good work for the Navy as he then did for the Republican party, he will be the best Secretary of the Navy we have ever had in this country. [Laughter.] He quotes Mr. Thompson, who he says recommends it, while Mr. Thompson simply acted upon the report of a board. He does not quote Mr. Hunt, who does not recommend it. Now, I think the value of the opinion of Mr. Thompson and Mr. Hunt and Mr. Chandler is just about equal, each to the other, as to this business of finishing monitors. It is very possible neither one of them ever saw a monitor; I am not quite sure about that, however.

The next authority presented by the committee consists of an extract from the report of Admiral David D. Porter to the Secretary of the Navy, dated November 6, 1874, in which the recommendation is distinctly made that monitors of the kind which we now have upon the stocks would be valuable vessels, and that they ought to be built.

The first thing that struck me with surprise on reading that extract was the date of the letter, in 1874, about eight years ago. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS] has told us what a revolution eight years has produced in naval warfare. What was good eight years ago is utterly worthless now. So I wrote a note to Admiral Porter, telling him that I had found that recommendation in the report of the committee, and asking him whether he still adhered to it. I will read his answer:

1710 H STREET, NORTHWEST,
June 26, 1882.

MY DEAR SIR: I beg leave to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 24th instant.

You will observe in my annual report for 1881, addressed to Mr. Secretary Hunt, page 96 of Secretary of the Navy's report, that I recommended these monitors should be finished on the plan recommended by the late Chief Constructor Lenthall, if finished at all.

I call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the fact that even Mr. Lenthall's recommendations, which are to be found in a very elaborate document printed in 1880, and which I have here on my desk—even Mr. Lenthall's recommendations as read this morning, by the way, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HARRIS,] are of the most qualified sort. He condemns the monitors on any plan that had up to that time been adopted for their completion. He does suggest in 1880 certain modifications which if made might make them useful vessels of war. Admiral Porter further says:

Mr. Lenthall made a minority report on this subject, which report is referred to by me in my annual report above mentioned. I inclose you a copy of Mr. Lenthall's report which will give you all the necessary information.

I think if the monitors are finished on the plan proposed by the board they will not amount to much; finished on Mr. Lenthall's plan they would help protect our ports against Spanish ships of war, as that power has not any very heavily plated iron-clads, and is the country with whom we are most likely to have trouble.

Now, it is certain that any vessel that can take care of an English or a French or an Italian iron-clad, can also take care of a Spanish iron-clad, but any vessel that will only take care of a Spanish iron-clad would be like a card-box against the vessels of the other great naval powers. Admiral Porter concludes as follows:

As to finishing these vessels without a carefully devised plan, or without following Mr. Lenthall's suggestions, they will be no better than the vessels they are copied after. Many officers of the Navy think the vessels should not be finished at all; but there is some good in them as far as they go, and if Mr. Lenthall's plans are carried out they can be made serviceable for harbor defense, as I before remarked.

I think the reports I have mentioned will give you what you require in the way of information.

Very respectfully, yours,

DAVID D. PORTER, Admiral.

Hon. A. S. HEWITT, M. C.

I think that disposes of the authority sought to be given to this recommendation by the great name of Admiral Porter.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] just in that connection allow me to call attention to the report made by the Committee on Appropriations, which purports to give an extract from the report of Secretary Thompson, made to Congress May 20, 1880? If the gentleman is going to refer to it himself, well and good; I will not interrupt him.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The only reason why I have not made larger extracts from that report is simply because I had so little time that I thought I could not afford it.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. If I do not interrupt the gentleman, I beg leave to call his attention and the attention of the committee to the wrong impression that would be made in that regard by the report from the Committee on Appropriations, in that it quotes only a part of what Secretary Thompson said, and fails to quote just what he did say in connection with and in pursuance of the idea of Admiral Porter as just now read, and of the report of the late constructor, Lenthall.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The next authority quoted by the committee is from Rear-Admiral Worden in a recent letter dated April 15, 1882. I addressed a similar letter to Admiral Worden, but I have been informed that he is ill and out of Washington, and I have received no answer.

Now, I beg to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the letter of Admiral Worden simply contains an approval of the monitor system. He approves of monitors, but is careful to refrain absolutely from uttering one word of recommendation in reference to these monitors of ours. So far as his authority goes, he simply supports the general doctrine that monitors are good for vessels, but says nothing in favor of these monitors.

There is another significant fact, that the advisory board convened by Secretary Hunt for the express purpose of considering what vessels we should provide for a navy, never so much as gave an intimation that these five monitors are of any value or ought to be finished. They fight shy of them. The omission of the board, even to refer to these vessels, I hold to be an absolute condemnation of these ships, so far as any claim that they are such ships as this country wants us to provide for a navy.

More than that; there was a conference held between the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House, the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, this advisory board, and Secretary Hunt. I have the documents here and will refer gentlemen to them. In that conference not one word was uttered in regard to these five monitors, nor was any recommendation made for their completion.

But at that conference there was the most absolute condemnation of the methods upon which the money appropriated to the Navy Department has been expended, that is to say, by the heads of bureaus, responsible to no human being, unless it be to the Secretary of the Navy, who from the very nature of his training is not competent to pass upon their action, as I have already shown.

It is all summed up in the remarks of Commander Evans, and I propose to read them as concluding all that is necessary to say on the subject of providing an intermediary tribunal as contemplated in the naval bill, and which has been urged so strongly by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HARRIS,] and for which I propose to provide by an amendment which I shall offer to this bill at the proper stage:

The CHAIRMAN. Is not that the system that must be adopted in order to build these ships successfully?

Commander EVANS. It seems to me so. The way that the work has gone on in the Navy heretofore has been, to say the least of it, ridiculous. The old plan was this: when a ship was to be built the constructors would build her hull; when that was done, and the engineers came to look at it, they would say: "Hallo, there is no room here for the engines." So they would put her down a foot more in the water; and then when the ordnance officer came along he would say the hatches were too close to the water-ways, so that the guns couldn't be mounted; then the equipment officer would complain that he couldn't swing men enough to fight the guns, and so on. I think it is time that system was stopped.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think it is possible to make any progress until we have a head to this business; one executive and a board of advisers at the head?

Commander EVANS. I think that to build these ships successfully you must have a board to do it, and the plans must be prepared by that board. The plans of the engines must be given to the engineer to build; and the plan of the hull to the constructor, and so on throughout each department of the ship. You must say to each, "There are your plans; do not vary an inch one way or the other;" and then, if the parts do not fit when the ship is finished, you had better hang some of these people.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you not know that in the Navy in the past there has been a strong hostility to an advisory board of this character?

Commander EVANS. No, sir; not in the Navy, I think. There has been, though, in the Navy Department. The bureau officers, naturally, will always be opposed to anything that cuts their power or authority.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you not think that it existed among the line officers as well as the staff?

Commander EVANS. No, sir; I think not. I never heard a line officer express that feeling in my life. On the contrary, I have heard a great many of the line officers pray for the day when we would have a board organized. You see the line officer is the man who suffers most from the evils we have been speaking of. The line officer finds himself sent to sea in ships that cannot fight and that are utterly unseaworthy. I have had some experience in one of them myself, the Delaware, in China. That vessel rolled thirty-seven degrees each way, and if you had cast a gun loose it would have taken charge of the whole concern.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is that ship now?

Commander EVANS. She is now the hospital ship at New York.

The CHAIRMAN. And worthless for any naval purpose?

Commander EVANS. Utterly so. She was commenced in the latter part of the war and finished just about the close of the war. Her tonnage was about 3,200 tons. She went to China on one cruise, and that is about all she has ever done.

Nothing can add to the force of a statement of that sort coming from so accomplished an officer; but there are confirmations from all quarters, and I have collated a large number of just such specimens of testimony. But I leave the matter there.

Now, waiving questions of order for the present, unless this bill be amended so as to provide for practical supervision in the expenditure of this money, either upon the monitors or upon new ships, I think I am justified in saying that it will be money absolutely thrown away; and perhaps it was intended to be thrown away. I do not know how this may be, but at any rate I think I may appeal to fair-minded men on both sides to concede the necessity of adopting proper safeguards as to the expenditure of this money.

Now, I come to the value of these monitors. I have shown you that there is the very gravest doubt as to whether they will be of any use when they are done. There is, however, one set of men who have no earthly doubt about the propriety of finishing these monitors—no earthly doubt that they will be the best ships in the world when finished; and these men are the contractors. They had a hearing on February 16, 1882, before the Committee on Naval Affairs, of which my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. HARRIS,] who has been indefatigable in trying to get at the truth in this business, is chairman. Mr. Gause, of the Harlan & Hollingsworth Company, makes the following assertion:

Opposition to these monitors has come from a certain quarter. It grows mainly out of the fact that a monitor is the most undesirable ship for a line officer to go to sea in that ever was constructed, because in a monitor they have to live comparatively under water. That is one of the great objections to these monitors for line officers, and I do not blame them for it. The idea of cruising in a monitor for months is something appalling to think of.

This is the testimony of a contractor—that after you have finished these ships the idea of putting a line officer on board, to say nothing of the crew and the engineers and firemen, is simply appalling. Do we want to build dungeons? Is that what we are after? Surely some other type of ship will be devised free from these objections. Other nations do not build such sepulchers, and we ought not to build them. I for one will not vote a dollar for the purpose of sending a line officer, possibly a De Long or a Melville or a Danenhower, to be sacrificed in a vessel which this contractor says it is appalling to think of.

OPPOSITION TO THE MONITORS.

Opposition to these monitors is not confined to line officers. It comes mainly from the staff officers; it arises from the fact that they were begun before they were designed. They have been designed many times since they were begun. Every new board or expert directed to examine them finds grave defects in the various designs, that must be corrected at the expense of the Government for the benefit of the contractors. The money thus far expended on them without authority of law has been thrown away, and further expenditure would be a further waste of money until the plans for completing them have been subjected to a critical examination, the computations verified, and specific contracts for the work to be executed entered into with responsible men. Opposition on the part of Congress and the public is based on the fact that these unfinished monitors have no legal existence.

In regard to the Puritan, I understand—and I have given you the evidence—that she was built as a new vessel from the word "go," when the old vessel was twenty miles away. Is there a lawyer in this House who will tell me that the Puritan in the yard of John Roach is a legal structure to-day?

Opposition must inevitably exist to the completion of these monitors on the part of every law-abiding, honest man in this country who examines into their origin and progress and who is not prepared to sanction the assumption by a subordinate staff officer of the Navy Department of the powers conferred on Congress alone. For let it be remembered that the order to build that ship was not given by the Secretary of the Navy; I find no evidence of that; the order was given by Isaiah Hanscom, an ordinary bureau officer, in an ordinary letter, without any contract being drawn by any human being.

In the various documents which have been submitted to Congress in relation to these unfinished monitors, in the testimony that has been reluctantly given by the contractors themselves, there is abundant proof that, with the exception of the Monadnock, they were ordered to be built by the chief of the Bureau of Construction, not only without authority of law but, so far as can be ascertained, without authority from the President or Secretary of the Navy, and in the case of the Puritan without even the knowledge of his associates in the Department.

Curiously enough tenders were received for the Monadnock. It is the duty of the chief of the Construction Bureau to report annually to the Secretary, and to attach to the report a list of the tenders he has accepted. There is no such report as to the Puritan, the Terror, the Amphitrite, or any of the others except the Monadnock. In the case of the latter vessel there is attached to his report a statement that tenders were opened and that the work was awarded to the lowest bidder. Here is the confession of this man that there was a legal obligation to give the work upon tenders to the lowest bidder. I do not know why he made this confession; but plainly there is a negative pregnant: in the one case he did it; why did he not do it in the case of the other four? If it was not a corrupt job, why was no competition permitted?

I repeat that except in the case of the Monadnock they were ordered to be built by the chief of the Bureau of Construction, not only without authority of law, but, so far as can be ascertained, without authority from the President or Secretary of the Navy, unless the Secretary will tell us to-day that he gave the authority, and I hope he will tell us when he takes the floor. There is nothing on record to show that the Secretary ever gave such an order, and in the case of the Puritan work was done without even the knowledge of the officer's associates in the Department. Two of the bureaus—the Bureau of Construction and Repair, headed by that honest and able man, John Lenthall, and the Bureau of Steam-Engineering, headed by Isherwood—did not know that the order had been given; so these officers have stated.

Mr. ROBESON. Does the gentleman know that Lenthall and Isherwood had neither of them been in the bureau for five years before that?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I said "without the knowledge of his associates in the Department." I did not say that they were heads of bureaus at the time. I know that the place was made too hot to hold those honest men.

ARE THEY LAWFUL STRUCTURES?

I say that Congress cannot appropriate money to complete these monitors without tacitly acknowledging their legal existence and admitting that a subordinate naval officer who happened to be on duty as a chief of bureau in a Department was justified in involving the Government in an expenditure of ten or twelve million dollars in defiance of law and without regard to consequences.

Instead of appropriating money for the completion, Congress should instruct the legal officers of the Government to institute proceedings to recover what has been already spent on these vessels. I do not know how much responsibility the Secretary may choose to assume, but if ever I was clear on any subject I am convinced by the evidence I have stated that there was a corrupt bargain between Isaiah Hanscom and the contractors, who are therefore participes criminis, and entitled to no consideration and no indulgence from this House.

In the statement which the Secretary made before the committee in the Forty-fourth Congress, he very properly and carefully says that all a Secretary can do is to approve of the general principle by which the old material was to be used in the repairs of new vessels. But he says the work must be done by the heads of bureaus, "experts," as he calls them; and he never issued an order himself in reference to any of these details. And I think the Secretary tells, as he always endeavors to tell, the exact truth. I cannot discover the evidence of any such order, although I find plenty of orders issued by his subordinates.

Now, let some one point out the specific or the general authority of Congress for this expenditure on these monitors. I have pointed out the peculiar manner by which the Secretary explains how he came to take the responsibility; that as he had the right to use the old material in repairs in the navy-yards, he thought by parity of reasoning he might, if he made a contract with a contractor, take the old materials and pay the contractor with them instead of money. While the law and the practice is clear as to the navy-yard, but there is no law and there was no precedent for paying a contractor with anything but money, and there is no safety in any other course. I often have occasion to say I am no lawyer, but there are some propositions which offend one's sense, that underlying sense, I suppose, upon which all law is built up, and I cannot discover the slightest justification by which these materials were turned over to the contractors in payment for what? In repair of ships? I have shown it was not repair, but for building an entire new ship, twenty miles away from the ship that was said to be repaired.

It would seem impossible more forcibly to illustrate the need of reform in our naval administration, but the worst remains to be told. The origin of the new Puritan appears in an offer made to Mr. Hanscom, dated December 3, 1874, by Mr. John Roach, of Chester. That is the date when Mr. Hanscom signs his letter to the Secretary in which he says that nothing is being done on the Puritan. On that very date, and, I suppose, within five minutes after he signed his name to that statement, Mr. John Roach, of Chester, makes his offer. On the 12th of December, 1874, nine days after the above offer was made, Mr. Hanscom accepts it with a statement that when the exact dimensions of the new vessel were ascertained a further and more explicit acceptance will be made. Think of contracting to build a vessel, estimated to cost $2,000,000, before her dimensions were determined!

Compare this with the years of study and the elaborate computations which are made preparatory to building an iron-clad in Europe. Another board reported the hull of the Puritan at load-water line would displace about 1,700 tons less than the weight of material the contractor and this chief of Bureau of Construction had finally decided to put on it and in it. In other words, the Puritan would be another of the "totally submerged" class of monitors designed by the Bureaus of Steam-Engineering and Construction and their assistants. In every case the weights to be carried have been reduced by the boards appointed to investigate.

To overcome the difficulty compound armor instead of laminated has been proposed, coal capacity and engine power have been reduced, and various other devices proposed that would enable these vessels to float with the loads they must carry, in order to be worthy the name of iron-clad.

Just how much dependence can be placed on the assertions of the contractors who are here from time to time in person, and are always represented by others in and out of office when this question is being discussed, I will now demonstrate to the House.

On page 4 of their statement in relation to the unfinished monitors Mr. Roach makes the following assertion:

> In order to show you the caution and care taken in the designing of these vessels and their fitness for the use intended for them, I will give you some little information.

The "caution and care taken in the designing of these vessels" is aptly illustrated in the report of what is known as the "Mullany board," convened in June, 1877, two years and six months after the Puritan had been begun. It is there recorded that it was necessary for the board to prepare plans from which to compute her displacement. There did not exist up to that time, three years after she was contracted for, a plan from which her displacement could be computed.

I will now read the conclusions of another board in relation to the Puritan:

> First. Neither plans nor specifications were drawn for the construction of the new Puritan, nor were any measures adopted to ascertain whether, when built, she would sink or swim. The failure or success of a first-class national iron-clad was thus put to the hazard of mere chance.
> Second. This vessel, as far as constructed, and if finished as contemplated, is a total failure, nor can any changes now practicable make her efficient—meaning by that term equality with foreign iron-clads of the same size and type.

The Committee of Naval Affairs has been told by the present Secretary of the Navy, who quotes from one of his predecessors, that "the unanimity of opinion in reference to each of these vessels would seem to leave no room of doubt," &c. Reading over all that has been reported by the several boards and experts who have examined these vessels, there appears to be anything but "unanimity of opinion" except as to one point, which is that they cannot under any circumstances be completed as originally contemplated, and that they cannot under any circumstances be made efficient iron-clad vessels compared with those that have been recently built or are now under construction in the same state as these unfinished monitors are. There is not even "unanimity of opinion" as to the necessity of iron-clads of their class at all. When we review the origin and progress, and compare the cost of iron-clads, and examine closely into their achievements, we find that the few naval officers who lead in the already rapid reaction toward unarmored vessels for fighting have reasons and facts undisputed and indisputable as the foundation of their objection.

THE PURITAN AND THE DEVASTATION.

As a further illustration of the attempt that has been made to throw dust in the eyes of Congress in relation to the comparative merits of these vessels, we find Mr. Roach recklessly declaring that the British iron-clad Devastation "could not enter the ports of New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, or any of the other ports" except Portland, Boston, and New London, owing to her great draught, and that "she could not carry coal enough for the purpose of crossing the ocean." He then proceeds to "compare the cost of the Puritan with that of similar ships on the other side of the water," and gives the cost of the Inflexible, Devastation, Ajax, and other British vessels.

The Devastation was designed in 1869, before the compound engine had been adopted; completed in 1873, and has had seven years of service. The Puritan was not designed at all, but commenced in 1874, five years after the Devastation was designed, and one year after she was completed, and the Puritan is still on stocks in embryo—not even an egg—a shell merely, to which all the vast improvements in machinery, armor, and armament that have been made during the last ten years may be applied with the result of increasing the resisting power of her armor and penetrating power of her guns as much as 20 per cent., and the economy of her engines as much as 60 per cent.

Why should we compare the Puritan with the Devastation, the future with the past? The only reason for such a comparison would be to throw dust in the eyes of Congress, while we hurrah for the old flag and secure a big appropriation. Mr. Roach's assertions that the Devastation "could not enter New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, or any of the other ports, except Boston, Portland, and New London at high tide," and that "she could not carry coal enough for the purpose of crossing the ocean" are unqualifiedly false.

From the official report of Chief Engineer King, entitled "European ships of war, 1877," on pages 37-45, you will find a complete description of this vessel; from which it appears that the Devastation carries ordinarily in her regular bunkers 1,350 tons of coal, and extraordinarily in various places available for the purpose 250 tons more. Steaming at the rate of ten knots per hour, she can with 1,600 tons of coal, her maximum capacity, complete a distance of 5,572 knots, or nearly double the distance from New York to Queenstown, and nearly double that from Plymouth to Halifax, two British stations, one on each side of the Atlantic.

Steaming at her maximum sea-speed of twelve knots per hour, she could go from Plymouth to New York in ten days, and have coal enough left for an attack. The Devastation can keep the sea for twenty-three days, steaming at the rate of ten knots an hour, and yet Mr. Roach goes before a committee of this House and deliberately states that "she could not carry coal enough for the purpose of crossing the ocean."

The Devastation's maximum draught of water is officially reported by the same authority as 27 feet and 1 inch. She would at this draught displace 9,298 tons, having on board 1,350 tons of coal. Having crossed the Atlantic at the rate of ten knots per hour, and consumed two-thirds of her coal, (900 tons,) her maximum draught would then be less than 26 feet. This depth of water is carried in and out of the port of New York on an average of twice a month by regular transatlantic steamers.

THE MIANTONOMOH.

The ignorance displayed by Mr. Roach in his statement is the only excuse for his assertions. The qualities he ascribes to the ideal Puritan and other vessels that he is building exist only in his own imagination. It is impossible to compare a vessel that has never been designed, although partly built, with others that have been designed and built. Until some definite plans are formed for the Puritan, Terror, Amphitrite, and Monadnock, discussing their comparative qualities would be profitless. But the Miantonomoh has advanced to a stage that permits a comparison between her and "similar" vessels cited by Mr. Roach, the Ajax and Agamemnon among them. A comparison with these vessels would not have been made had it not been provoked. Their draught is such that they may enter every one of our important ports. They were very carefully designed about the same time the new Puritan was ordered to be built by the chief constructor of our Navy before he had quite decided on her dimensions. Their keels were laid in 1876; they were launched in 1879, and are now much nearer completion that the Miantonomoh.

The hull of this vessel is protected with a belt of solid iron armor 7 inches thick amidships, 5 inches and 3 inches at the ends, backed by wood varying in thickness from 20 inches to 24 inches. The Ajax and the Agamemnon have an armor belt around them composed of two thicknesses of iron, one 10 inches, the other 8, and two thicknesses of wood, one 10 inches, the other 9, or 18 inches of iron and 19 inches of wood. The comparative resistance of these two belts of armor may safely be stated as 3 to 1 in favor of the Ajax and Agamemnon. The turrets of the Miantonomoh are not yet definitely designed; they cannot exceed 10 inches in thickness of compound armor, for she could not carry thicker in addition to the other weights still to be placed on board. The thickness of solid armor of the English turret is 16 inches, composed of 10¾ inches of iron faced with 5¼ inches of steel, and termed compound armor.

The resistance of the turrets of the Ajax and Agamemnon will be nearly double that of the Miantonomoh. Guns will project from the turrets.

The guns of the Miantonomoh are not yet built. Those designed for her, the heaviest she can carry, are four 10-inch breech-loading rifles, weighing about 20 tons, that will throw a broadside of 1,600 pounds with a power capable of penetrating about 15 inches of iron armor at 1,000 yards. These guns are purely ideal. The guns of the Ajax are 12½ inches in diameter, breech-loading rifles, weighing 38 tons each; they will throw a broadside of 3,374 pounds with a force capable of penetrating 17¾ inches of solid iron at 1,000 yards.

Differently expressed, the Miantonomoh's guns will not penetrate the Ajax armor at any point, while the Ajax's guns will go right through the Miantonomoh's side armor, in one side and out the other, and easily penetrate her turret.

The Ajax can carry 700 tons, or six days' supply of coal, to steam at the rate of 13 knots per hour. The Miantonomoh carries 531 tons and may steam at the rate of 10 knots per hour. At full speed the Ajax and her class can steam about 500 miles farther than the Miantonomoh. At 10 knots per hour, the Ajax could steam almost twice across the Atlantic, while the Miantonomoh only half way across.

It was evidently impolitic for Mr. Roach to provoke a comparison between the two vessels as to qualities. As to cost, the estimated cost of the two vessels is about equal if we take account of material delivered to Mr. Roach in part payment for his work, and admit that the estimates for completing the Miantonomoh are correct. But the cost per ton displacement of the Miantonomoh will be at least double that of the Ajax, in spite of her vast inferiority in every particular.

I will now quote Chief Engineer King on the comparative qualities of the Miantonomoh and other vessels that she could not decline to fight:

> The offensive and defensive powers of this vessel (the Miantonomoh) can perhaps be best shown by comparison with the British and French coast defenders. This may readily be made by reference to the descriptions and dimensions previously given of the British vessels Glatton, built upward of ten years ago, and Conqueror, now building, and the French coast defenders Tonnerre, put afloat in 1878, and others.
> It will be seen that the Glatton has the same speed, but that her armor is 12 inches thick above water and 10 inches below water, while that of the Miantonomoh is but 7 inches maximum with reductions at the ends and below water. As the armament of either ship may be changed to suit the times no comparison in this respect can be made at present. The Glatton carries her guns 6 feet higher above water than those of the Miantonomoh. She has, however, 4½ feet greater draught of water.
> The Conqueror, which is much more powerful, may be regarded as a sea-going vessel, her upper decks being 9 feet 6 inches above the load-water line, with comfortable quarters aft above this deck, while her 240-ton breech-loaders will be mounted so high above water as to be capable of being worked at sea in any weather. Her armor, which is compound, (iron faced with steel,) is 12 inches thick on the water-line and on the turret, and her indicated horse-power of 4,500 will give an estimated speed of thirteen knots an hour.
> The Tonnerre, like the Glatton, is a breastwork monitor, carrying one turret, in which at present are mounted two 12½-inch breech loading rifles; her speed is recorded at fourteen knots, and her armor is 13 inches thick on the water-line and 14 inches on the turret. Her guns being mounted high above water, she also is capable of going to distant seas, and may be regarded as a powerful vessel.
> The advantages possessed by the Miantonomoh over the last two named vessels are lighter draught and a greater number of guns. The disadvantages are an armor too thin for protection against heavy modern projectiles.

Mr. King failed to add other conspicuous disadvantages of the Miantonomoh, such as lower speed, vastly inferior sea-going qualities, cramped quarters, small coal capacity, and inferior power of armament.

Let gentlemen who are in doubt as to whether we shall appropriate money for completing these vessels read a report of the veteran distinguished chief constructor, Lenthall, dated April 27, 1880, in Executive Document 82, Forty-sixth Congress, second session, and remark the "unanimity of opinion" alleged by our new Secretary in favor of completing this vessel. And I warn Congress of the inevitable consequences of recognizing by any law direct or indirect the existence of these unfinished monitors. Just as sure as such recognition is made the Government will be called on to pay an infinite variety of charges for work on these vessels and space occupied by them. This is already intimated in the statements of the contractors, who now have no standing whatever in the matter and must seek redress from those who illegally contracted with them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to move to extend the time of the gentleman from New York, and the gentleman from New Jersey can also have his time extended.

The CHAIRMAN. That cannot be done in committee.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. If the gentleman will allow me a moment, I desire to say that I have reached now a point in my remarks where the remainder has been reduced to writing, and even if the committee gave me permission to continue I should not feel able to do so to-day. I will therefore simply ask leave to print the remainder of this work, and thank the committee for its attention.

There was no objection.

THE ROBESON NAVY.

The gentleman from New Jersey, in charge of this bill, [Mr. ROBESON,] said, during the debate on the deficiency appropriation bill:

> Thank God, every ship that now bears the flag of America and carries its guns was built by me or was substantially repaired under my direction, and I am responsible for it.—Congressional Record, June 8, page 36.

Subsequently Mr. BLOUNT made the following statement:

> As to the vessels used in that connection, [putting down the rebellion which was rife in the southern part of this country—ROBESON,] Congress passed laws providing for their sale. They ought to have been sold; but objection was made, and the gentleman in spite of an universal sentiment that they were worthless, went to enormous expense in repairing those vessels; and everybody admits that they are worthless at this hour.—Congressional Record, June 8, page 36.

To which Mr. ROBESON replied:

> So far is the gentleman's statement from being accurate when he says that everybody agrees that the ships I undertook to provide for the defense of this country were good for nothing, I affirm that every respectable authority from that time to this has pronounced them the best of the kind that could have been provided.—Congressional Record, June 8, page 36.

Thus it appears that the gentleman from New Jersey accepts the responsibility for the vessels "built," "substantially repaired," and "rebuilt" during his administration of the Navy Department. The expression "undertook to provide" covers all cases.

I expressed my own opinions as follows during that debate:

> I believe he [Mr. ROBESON] was the victim, if victim he was, of the bureaus of the Navy Department, which recklessly squandered these vast amounts of money, and if any more money is to be put into the custody of those bureaus it will follow the money which heretofore has been put into their hands and thrown away, and result in a worthless Navy, as it is declared to be by the Secretary of the Navy and by the Naval Committee.—Congressional Record, June 8, page 37.

My purpose now is to substantiate these assertions by submitting facts and comparisons that cannot be disputed, and which so far as possible are derived from the answers to the resolution of inquiry which I offered in January last, and which is numbered Executive Document No. 30, Forty-seventh Congress, first session. For convenience of treatment I will divide the vessels that Mr. ROBESON "undertook to provide for the defense of this country" into four groups. Group 1 will comprise seven of the eight vessels authorized to be built by "act of February 10, 1873;" the Huron having been lost, no information was furnished about her. Group 2 will comprise the unarmored vessels that were "substantially" repaired. Group 3 will comprise all the iron-clad vessels that were "substantially repaired;" group 4, those that he ordered to be rebuilt.

The vessels comprised in group 1 are the Adams, Alert, Alliance, Enterprise, Essex, Ranger, and Trenton. The first six of these are in active service in commission. The Trenton is laid up in the Brooklyn navy-yard. We will consider this vessel separately, owing to the persistent manner in which she is cited on all available occasions by naval constructors and engineers as a sample of what they can accomplish in marine architecture and engineering. The act of Congress authorizing the construction of these vessels reads as follows:

> That the Secretary of the Navy be authorized to construct eight steam-vessels of war, with auxiliary sail-power, and of such class or classes as in his judgment will best subserve the demands of the service, each carrying six or more guns of large caliber; the hulls to be built of iron or wood, as the Secretary may determine: Provided, That the aggregate tonnage of the whole number shall not exceed 8,000 tons, and that the cost of building the same shall not exceed $3,200,000: And provided, That four of said vessels shall be built, in whole or in part, in private yards, upon contract with the lowest responsible bidder therefor, upon public competition and proposals, due notice thereof being given by advertisement, upon models, specifications, and drawings, furnished by the Navy Department and under its direction and supervision, if, upon full examination and consideration, the same shall be deemed practicable by the Secretary of the Navy; or the hulls of any portion of said vessels may be built upon private contract in the Government yards upon like proposals, models, specifications, drawings, and supervision, and upon like examination and consideration, the Government in either case furnishing such materials as may be deemed practicable by the Secretary of the Navy.

SEC. 2. That neither of said vessels shall be commenced until full and complete models, specifications, and drawings shall be made for its construction in all its parts. And after such models and drawings are approved by the proper authority, they shall not be changed in any respect when the cost will exceed $100,000, except upon the recommendation of a board of survey composed of not less than five officers of the Navy, and approved by the Secretary of the Navy; and if changes are thus made, the actual cost of, and damage caused by, such changes shall be estimated by such board of survey; and the terms of the contract shall provide that the contractors shall be bound by the estimate of said board as to the amount of increased or diminished compensation they are to receive, if any, in consequence of any such changes.

With such a large discretion, and with the certainty that Congress would make additional appropriations to complete the vessels if the $3,200,000 granted in the act was found insufficient, the country had a right to expect "eight steam vessels of war" of which it would not be ashamed and on which it could rely to some extent for national defense. In anticipation of the objection that may be raised to an assumption that Congress would appropriate more money, I will here state that the expenditure on hulls and motive power (which includes spars, sails, and machinery) of the "eight steam vessels of war" aggregated more than $4,810,000 in money, according to various official statements of the Department that have been put together, besides an unknown quantity of machinery and materials consumed and transformed in their construction, and for their equipment and outfit.

With the vast stores of timber, machinery, iron, and other materials, and with a costly plant in the various navy-yards lying idle and available for all the operations involved in the construction of "eight steam vessels of war," the $3,200,000 appropriated specifically for their construction would have been ample to create the finest vessels that have ever borne our flag. Now, let us critically examine and compare the cost and qualities of these vessels, and from this determine whether or not Congress would be justified in making any more appropriations to be spent at the unlimited discretion of the Secretary and his irresponsible chiefs of bureaus.

The first six vessels of this group displace 7,740 tons; the expenditure of money on their hulls and motive power, according to the information furnished, aggregates a little over $3,000,000, or at the rate of $387 per ton of displacement, which is the most convenient and, indeed, only possible standard of comparison for vessels of similar types. If we include the cost and value of pieces of machinery utilized in the construction of their engines, and of materials consumed in the construction of their hulls, spars, rigging, and sails, these six "steam vessels of war" will be found to have cost the Government certainly not less than $5,000,000, and possibly much more, which would be at the rate of $646 per ton displacement. This estimate is based on proportionate value of material to labor in construction of vessels. Comparing the actual money outlay, $387 per ton displacement, with the cost of the hull and motive power of the best merchant steamers, it will appear that the money expended on the hulls and motive power of these vessels is fully four times the cost of hulls and motive power of merchant steamers.

It is conceded that naval vessels must be stronger, more carefully built, and better finished; but how four times the cost of similar vessels in the merchant service could have been spent on these six steam vessels of war is a problem that needs solution by those who spent it before Congress would be justified in intrusting to them any more money. As to the durability of these vessels we are happily in a position to judge by the information furnished in answer to my resolution. In spite of their excessive cost these six vessels have required an expenditure of more than $800,000 in repairs during the six years of their service; and what is still more startling, we find from the information furnished by the Bureau of Steam-Engineering that four of these vessels need new boilers that will cost $400,000 more by the time they are in place and ready for service.

What better illustration could be given of the inefficiency of the system under which these vessels were constructed and the incompetency of the men that designed them and supervised their construction than these two pertinent facts: original cost at least four times more than it should have been; construction so inferior as to necessitate an outlay of 26 per cent. (not including proposed new boilers) of the first cost in repairs during first six years of service—a period during which, in the merchant marine, 15 per cent. of first cost is considered adequate for deterioration and repairs.

We come now to the question of efficiency; and the only way by which we may arrive at the degree of efficiency of these "six steam-vessels of war" is to compare them with an equal amount of tonnage of foreign navy built about the same time and of a similar type. This type is the ocean unarmored cruiser, which in time of war may be called upon to blockade any enemy's ports, destroy its commercial vessels, and escape from or fight its cruisers.

It must be evident that high speed is the first essential quality of such a type; without it blockading is a farce, pursuit of an unarmed vessel vain, and escape from an armed one impossible. The highest speed that can possibly be obtained by either of these six vessels is ten and three-quarter knots per hour. This is about the average speed at sea under ordinary conditions of the common freight steamers of the merchant marine. It is two to three knots less than the speed of the same classes of vessels in foreign navies built about the same time. It is five knots less than the average speed of some of the transatlantic steamers built about the time these vessels were designed. In the matter of speed, therefore, these six new vessels are failures. Next to speed comes economy in the consumption of fuel. The importance of this quality in an American vessel of war may be appreciated by remembering that we have no coaling stations away from our home ports that would be available in time of war.

A wide discrepancy exists between the rates of consumption of the engines of these vessels given in the statement of Bureau of Steam-Engineering (Executive Document No. 30, part 3) and of the same bureau in the appendix to the report of the honorable Secretary of the Navy for 1875, (page 119.) In the former, the consumption of coal per indicated horse-power per hour of the Adams is given as 1.92 pounds; while in the latter it is given as 2.25 pounds. A difference of .33 pound per hour in the consumption of fuel means a great deal. It means in the case of this vessel that with the lower rate of consumption she could steam one-sixth further on the same amount of fuel than she could at the higher. The Ranger, one of the six vessels of group 1, consumes 3.06 pounds of coal per indicated horse-power per hour. We find on page 125 of the same report (Secretary Navy's, 1875) that this vessel's engines were designed by the Bureau of Steam-Engineering, and built at Chester, Pennsylvania, presumably by Mr. J. Roach. She has engines identically the same as the Alert, which consumes 2.8 pounds per hour, the two vessels being identically the same, displacement and model.

It appears that the average rate of consumption of coal per indicated horse-power per hour of these six new "steam-vessels of war" is 2.65 pounds. This is at least three-quarters of a pound per hour in excess of the ordinary compound engines built at the time their engines were built. This difference put in another way is equivalent to stating that the engines built at the same time for merchant ships of the United States and for foreign vessels of war and merchant ships of the same power are nearly one-third more efficient and economical than those designed by the Bureau of Steam-Engineering, and built either by that bureau or by contract under its supervision.

Is not this the fullest justification for my conviction that the engineers of the Navy have not shown themselves to be as capable of designing engines as they are in spending money on their construction? The hulls, as well as the motive power of these six vessels, afford food for reflection. The Bureau of Construction reports an expenditure of $225,400 in repairs on their hulls in the first five years of their existence, a period during which they ought not to have cost a dollar for repairs. It is hardly worth while to discuss the armament of these vessels separately. The worthlessness of their armaments is conceded even by the Bureau of Ordnance that created them. We will return to the subject of our naval guns and the appropriations for the Bureau of Ordnance later on.

THE TRENTON AND THE BACCHANTE.

We come now to the Trenton, the pride of naval constructors and engineers, and described by some of our naval officers as the most formidable unarmored vessel afloat. A foreign naval officer once described the Trenton as a "formidable looking vessel." Attracted by her formidable appearance he got permission to examine her, and when asked by one of his brother officers on his return to his vessel what he had seen, he answered "nothing." Surprised that such an opinion should be expressed by an intelligent foreign officer on the pride of our Navy, it occurred to me to make a comparison between the essential features of the Trenton and some vessel of the same size built at the same time for a foreign navy. The Trenton displaces 3,900 tons, the Bacchante, a British ship, 4,070 tons; they were designed and completed about the same time, and for the same purpose. The object in view was an unarmored cruising ram of good speed and powerful battery. The hull of the Trenton is built of wood; that of the Bacchante is iron, specially strengthened to resist the racking of high speed, sheathed over outside, and covered with zinc below the water-line to prevent fouling.

The relative strength of the two hulls by actual computation, regarding them as girders or any other structures, is as 1 for the Trenton to 3 for the Bacchante. Their relative durability is as 1 to 4½ in favor of the Bacchante. The cost of the Trenton in money was $1,485,000, and in material on hand used in her construction about $900,000, making a total of say $2,385,000, not including her armament and outfit. The cost of the Bacchante was $1,115,000, not including armament, but including outfit. The relative values of the materials and labor in the two vessels, taking into account prices in the two countries, is as 1 for the Trenton to 2½ for the Bacchante.

The motive power of the Trenton cost at the rate $235, that of the Bacchante $69 per maximum indicated horse-power. The engines of the Trenton, costing three and a half times those of the Bacchante, consume at the rate of 2.95 pounds of coal per indicated horse-power per hour; those of the Bacchante 1.93, or one-third less. The maximum speed of the Trenton is 12.83 knots per hour; that of the Bacchante 15.06 knots per hour. Using two-thirds of her indicated horsepower, the Bacchante steams at the rate of three-quarters of a knot faster than it is possible for the Trenton to steam, using all of the power that can be got out of her engines. With one-third of her power the speed of the Bacchante is within a knot an hour of the highest possible speed of the Trenton with her maximum power. The Bacchante can steam at the rate of ten knots per hour, 2,630 knots. The Trenton at the same rate only 1,300 knots, or less than half as far, due partly to too small comparative capacity for coal and large comparative consumption.

The Trenton throws at one discharge of her broadside (six guns) a weight of 1,074 pounds of metal with a muzzle velocity of 1,450 feet per second; the Bacchante from her nine rifles in broadside 1,053 pounds with a muzzle velocity of 1,525 feet per second, and from her 64-pounder 64 pounds more with a velocity of 1,383 feet per second. The vessels are about evenly matched as far as their batteries are concerned, but in every other respect the Bacchante, although costing far less than the cost of the Trenton, is superior and more useful and more durable as a vessel of war. On page 303, volume 2, The British Navy, by Sir Thomas Brassey, there is this statement: "The second-class cruisers of the French navy have a conspicuous advantage both in speed and coal endurance over the English ships." What, I may add, must be the measure of their "conspicuous advantage" over the Trenton.

As to the durability of the Trenton we may judge by the fact that $34,200 was spent in repairing her hull during the first five years of her life, and now the Bureau of Construction reports that six months and $120,000, and the Bureau of Steam-Engineering three months and $150,000, are necessary in order to fit her for service.

Mr. ROBESON'S statement that every respectable authority has pronounced the ships he undertook to provide for the Navy "the best of the kind that could have been provided," so far as the eight steam vessels of war that he built are concerned, has thus been proven absolutely groundless. It would be unreasonable and unjust to blame the Secretary of the Navy alone for this failure. The people and their Chief Executive do not expect him to be a designing marine engineer and ship-builder.

Congress has provided the men for these duties. The chiefs of Bureaus of Construction and Repair and of Steam-Engineering are responsible under our present system for the designs and proper construction of naval vessels. They cannot shift the responsibility on other shoulders; it belongs to them, and they must answer for the grossest of extravagance and the worst of failures in the design and construction of these vessels, and it will be shown subsequently the failure to design other vessels that Mr. ROBESON undertook to provide.

THE UNARMORED VESSELS.

We will now consider group 2, the unarmored vessels of war, exclusive of tugs, &c., "substantially repaired" during Mr. ROBESON'S administration. No one has ever expected a Secretary of the Navy to know enough about the profession of which he is the nominal head to personally decide whether or not a vessel shall be substantially repaired. On this and on all strictly professional matters he must necessarily be guided by the advice of the naval experts at the heads of the bureaus of his Department; and until it is proven otherwise it is but fair to assume that Mr. ROBESON was advised to "substantially repair" the vessels in group 2.

These vessels are as follows: Alaska, Ashuelot, Benicia, Brooklyn, Canandaigua, Colorado, Congress, Franklin, Hartford, Iroquois, Juniata, Kansas, Kearsarge, Lackawanna, Lancaster, Minnesota, Mohican, Monocacy, Monongahela, Narragansett, Omaha, Ossipee, Pensacola, Plymouth, Powhatan, Richmond, Shawmut, Shenandoah, Tennessee, Ticonderoga, Tuscarora, Wabash, Wachusett, Wyoming, and Yantic. The "substantial repairs" executed on these vessels during Mr. ROBESON'S administration of the Navy cost in money $20,219,645, besides an enormous expenditure of material on hand, of which it is impossible to estimate the value. The money expenditure alone would have given the Navy ten of the most efficient armored vessels that could have been devised if honestly expended. Even squandered as other sums were it would have given the Navy thirteen vessels of the size, class, and power of the Trenton.

It will not do to plead that there was no authority of law for such a course, for the authority was found by the Secretary, and the rebuilding of the following named steam-vessels, or commencing to rebuild them, took place during his administration of the Navy: The Amphitrite, Catskill, Galena, Marion, Miantonomoh, Monadnock, Nipsic, Puritan, Quinnebaug, Swatara, Tallapoosa, Terror, and Vandalia, besides sailing vessels that we know nothing about. I have searched in vain for the authority of Congress for this proceeding. But it may have been good policy, and the Secretary must have believed that he had discretionary power in the matter. Certainly if he had discretion as to whether he should repair or rebuild thirteen vessels he had it for others, and so accepting his construction of the law, it is right to hold him to the responsibility he courts. It will save time and I hope present this question of "substantial repairs" more forcibly if we separate group 2 into two sections, those in commission in active service, and those that are either laid up or in commission not in active service. The first comprises the Tennessee, Kearsarge, Yantic, Brooklyn, Shenandoah, Lancaster, Pensacola, Lackawanna, Wachusett, Richmond, Iroquois, Ashuelot, and Monocacy.

The first vessel on this list is the now famous Tennessee. The cost of substantial repairs to her hull and motive power during Mr. ROBESON'S administration was $1,434,503 in money. In addition to this sum Mr. Roach, the contractor, for executing the repairs to her engines received her first engines, then as good as new, that had cost the Government $764,515. The Tennessee displaces 4,840 tons. Estimating the value of her first engines at $250,000, (which is below the ratio of values allowed in this country for simple engines when they are turned over to engine-builders for conversion into compound,) we may regard the cost of substantially repairing the hull and motive power of the Tennessee per ton displacement as about $350. At such a price we may reasonably expect that the hull and motive power of the Tennessee will require no additional repairs for a long time. But an examination of the information furnished will show that repairs to the hull and motive power of this vessel by the Government since she was delivered up by Mr. Roach amounts to $306,000.

As her boilers were built in 1871, they must now need renewal. Her hull is rapidly decaying, as it is of wood. Her machinery is of very inferior type, proven by the fact that the maximum speed of this costly vessel is ten knots; and that she consumes 2.95 pounds of coal per indicated horse-power per hour, which is over a pound more per horse per hour than common compound engines built at the same time. The model of this vessel is famous for its perfection. Her lack of speed must be blamed to her new engines, which cost about $450,000 in money and material, and have in three years required repairs amounting to $126,606 more. These engines built by Mr. Roach cost in money $264 and in money and material $438 per indicated horse-power. Mr. Roach testified before the Committee of Naval Affairs on May 8, 1876, in regard to those engines, as follows:

I found that there was a disposition to go to Europe to purchase the engines, and I made a proposal to the Secretary of the Navy to guarantee to build the engines of the Tennessee as good as he could get abroad, if not better, for the same price. I made the proposition and gave the guarantee. I lost $15,000, and the Government has the advantage of all the experiments with the compound engine, which were so costly.

It is perfectly legitimate, therefore, to compare the cost and performance of these and the amount paid Mr. Roach for them with the cost and performance of compound engines built in England at the same time for the British navy by contract.

We find that the cost per indicated horse per hour of engines of equal power with boilers built at the same time by contract in England, and completely fitted in place for service, averages $65, one-fourth what was paid to Mr. Roach in money, and more than six times the equivalent in money and material he actually received for the Tennessee's engines. In no case does the English engine consume more than 2 pounds per indicated horse per hour, or about two-thirds the consumption of the Tennessee. How much wiser it would have been for the Government to have saved Mr. Roach his $15,000, while saving itself about $300,000 and securing a better article. The worst feature of the Tennessee's engines remains to be told. In spite of their excessive cost and inferior quality, they weigh more and occupy more space in the vessel than their power justifies.

An exact comparison between the space occupied by the Tennessee's motive power (engines, boilers, and coal) and that of equal-powered vessels in foreign navies is not possible until data sent for is received. But a fair estimate shows that the Tennessee's engines weigh about one-half more per developed horse-power than they ought to weigh, and that the space occupied by her motive power is about double what the speed of the vessel justifies. The importance of this comparison will be apparent when we again recall the fact that we have no coaling stations.

As to the advantages derived from experiments with the compound engine which Mr. Roach declared the Government had acquired at his expense, some of his admirers und defenders should point them out. To the ordinary mind the Government appears to have paid for the experience of which Mr. Roach secured as the advantages, both tangible and experimental.

The next vessel on this list is the Kearsarge. The money expended on this vessel in "substantial repairs" during Mr. ROBESON'S administration was $667,000, or at the rate of $436 per ton of displacement, and more than double her first cost. This takes no account of the old material on hand and consumed in her repairs. Now, it must be admitted that the fame of this vessel justifies the perpetuation of her name as long as we have a Navy. But I contend that the money thrown away on substantial repairs could have been, and should have been, spent in rebuilding the vessel of such a type and power as to be of some service in the future, and be less liable to involve the name in disgrace in the event of war. In foreign navies the names made famous by victories such as that won over the Alabama are given to the best vessels that are built. Now, as to the efficiency of the Kearsarge after double her first cost was spent in substantially repairing her during Mr. ROBESON'S administration. To begin with, we find that so unsubstantial were these repairs that there has been spent on additional repairs $242,000 more since Mr. ROBESON left the Department. Thus we find that $908,000 in money alone has been spent in repairing the hull and motive power of a vessel since 1868 that cost only $246,916 in 1861, according to the information given on page 10, Executive Document 30, part 4. As to the comparative qualities of this vessel: her engines are the old-fashioned type; they consume 4.27 pounds of coal per indicated horse-power per hour, about two and a half times the reported consumption of the Adams, one of the eight new vessels that have already been discussed. This means that not only would the cost of new engines for the Kearsarge been much less than the cost of repairing the old ones but the cost of operating the new ones, producing the same results, would have been one-third that of operating the old ones.

It appears from the information furnished that the "substantial repairs" to the Kearsarge's old engines have cost more in money alone than the whole cost of new compound engines of equal power, of the latest type, put into vessels that were rebuilt without direct authority of law. And as to speed, we find the Kearsarge inferior in this respect to the slowest freight-steamers, and having considerably less speed than the new vessels of our own service. Could there be a more forcible presentation of the utter inefficiency of the bureau system? It is a strain on the charitable side of our nature to refrain from charging criminal incapacity to any one who advised or directed that this vessel should be repaired. The avoidance of such mistakes in future can only be secured by placing the control of the expenditure in a properly constituted board of supervision.

The story of the Kearsarge is essentially that of all the vessels substantially repaired. It is by no means the worse instance that can be cited. Let us take another vessel, the Pensacola. There was expended in money alone on substantial repairs to hull and motive power of this vessel, during Mr. ROBESON's administration of the Navy, $1,238,800, and since its close $316,800 more, making a total expenditure of money on the repairs to this vessel $1,555,600 during and since Mr. ROBESON entered the Department as its head. Comparing this with the expenditures on the Trenton during the same period, we find that the substantial repairs on the Pensacola are $50,000 in excess of the amount expended in building the Trenton and repairing her during her five years of service. Now, let us compare the two vessels: the Pensacola displaces 3,000 tons; the Trenton, 3,900 tons.

The cost per ton of substantially repairing the old Pensacola exceeds that of building and keeping in repair the New Trenton $17 per ton. The Pensacola has a speed of 9 knots per hour, and consumes 3.494 pounds of coal per indicated horse-power per hour, (see report 1875, page 119,) and 3.56 by the return to my resolution. The Trenton has a speed of 12.83 knots per hour, and consumes 2.04 pounds of coal per indicated horse-power per hour. Put this comparison in a different form, and it will read that the Trenton can steam more than a fourth faster than the Pensacola on 60 per cent. of the coal expended. In action, in cruising, in peace, and in war the superiority of the Trenton is overwhelming. As to battery, that of the Trenton is as superior to that of the Pensacola as this is to the batteries used in the war of 1812.

In an action between the Pensacola and the Trenton the latter could choose her distance and her position and destroy the former while remaining out of range of her guns. And yet in the same period the expenditures on substantial repairs on the Pensacola have exceeded the cost of building the Trenton by $50,000. Whether the responsibility for repairing the Pensacola belongs to the civilian at the head of the Department or to the so-called experts who were at the head of the Bureaus of Engineering and Construction and Repairs, the conclusion is irresistible that money should no longer be voted for new work until this utterly faulty system of administration shall have been changed.

The expenditure in money for substantial repairs to the other ten of the thirteen vessels comprising the first section of group 2, during Mr. ROBESON's administration, compared with the cost of rebuilding those that were rebuilt will only yield the same result and intensify the pressing need of a change in our system of naval administration. The remainder of group 2, comprising twenty-one unarmored vessels that were "substantially repaired" during Mr. ROBESON's administration are not now in active service, but afford an equally striking illustration of the absurdity of repairing obsolete types instead of pursuing a uniform policy of entirely rebuilding after condemning obsolete vessels. The Congress, Canandaigua, Narragansett, Kansas, Saco, Shawmut, and Wyoming are reported as worthless. There was spent in repairing the hulls and motive powers of the three first, during Mr. ROBESON's administration, $1,048,000. It would be interesting to know how many miles these vessels have steamed since the close of that administration, for as far as I can ascertain they have not been in active service any considerable time, and yet, having cost in repairs over one million of dollars, they are now universally condemned as "worthless" or "not worth repairing."

We will now compare the cost of substantially repairing the other four—Kansas, Saco, Shawmut, and Wyoming—during Mr. ROBESON's administration, with the cost of building an equal amount of new tonnage during the same period. The aggregate displacement of these four worthless vessels is 4,260 tons, that of the Adams, Essex, Enterprise, and Ranger, four of the new vessels built by Mr. ROBESON by authority of Congress, aggregates 4,415 tons. The cost of repairs to hull and motive power of the four worthless vessels during Mr. ROBESON's administration was $1,572,364; that of building the four new ones $1,825,440. From this it appears that the money spent on four absolutely worthless vessels would have built three absolutely new ones, even at the extravagant cost of the new ones.

REPAIRING AND REBUILDING COMPARED.

If the comparison is made with vessels that were rebuilt the same result is arrived at. It is difficult to understand how it was possible for sane men to recommend or approve the repairing of vessels, that must have been known to be worthless, at a cost almost equal to the buiding of new ones. Until we can fix the responsibility for such imbecility where it belongs, it is asking too much to expect Congress to allow the same imbecility to have the disbursement of the naval appropriation in future.

Of the remaining seventeen vessels of this group, four are reported as requiring extensive repairs to hulls and machinery that will cost (estimated) $1,300,000. Yet on these four vessels there was expended during Mr. ROBESON's administration no less than $2,788,500, and there has been expended since $460,900, making $3,249,400; and yet before they can be of any service in war they must absorb $1,300,000 more. My judgment is that Congress should prohibit by specific enactment the spending of another dollar on these vessels, for they are obsolete types, discarded by all other nations for fighting purposes, and will cost more to refit than they are worth.

Of the remaining eleven reported as in good condition and requiring repairs that are estimated to cost $2,660,000, not one will render the service adequate to this expenditure. They are also of obsolete types, low powered, with slow and old-fashioned engines that consume from two to three times the coal that modern engines of equal power consume. Let us take the Hartford as an example. She is an historic ship, her name should be perpetuated, and the ship that bears it should be worthy of it. This vessel has cost in repairs to her hull and motive power during and since Mr. ROBESON's administration $1,187,179. Her engines are of the old type, and will consume double the amount of coal per indicated horse-power that the Trenton's engines consume. Her speed cannot be more than three-fourths of the Trenton, and she will not be anything like as efficient a vessel, and yet she has cost for repairs to hull and engines more than the Trenton cost to build. We will dismiss group 2 without further comment. It does not contain a single vessel worthy to bear the flag of the United States in battle.

THE IRON-CLADS.

The vessels comprising group 3, (the iron-clads,) the Galena, Marion, Nipsic, Quinnebaug, Swatara, and Vandalia, were rebuilt, without authority of law, as I understand it, during the administration of Mr. ROBESON. These six and the seven new vessels built by authority of law comprise the only vessels of our Navy that can be considered as available for the formation of a cruising or blockading fleet in war. While the rebuilding of these vessels may have been judicious, I want to point out their enormous comparative cost and marked comparative inferiority to foreign vessels of the same class, built during the same time, as a further illustration of the imperative necessity for creating a deliberative body that will have control of the expenditures on naval vessels, and shall be invested with the power of revising or setting aside, if need be, the ill-considered plans of the Bureaus of Construction and Engineering.

The six vessels aggregate 10,875 tons displacement, and have cost for hulls and motive power in money $4,386,908, and no one seems to know how much more in material. This is at the rate of $403 in money per ton of displacement. From the information furnished it appears that the cost of repairs to these vessels since they were built has amounted to $475,448. Two of them now require new boilers. This proves beyond question that the enormous cost of these vessels must not be attributed to their exceptional strength or durability. Their comparative efficiency is arrived at by briefly considering their speed, consumption of coal, and battery. The fastest—the Quinnebaug—has a maximum speed of 12.9 knots per hour, and consumes 2.96 pounds of coal per indicated horse-power per hour. The slowest has a maximum speed of 10¼ knots and a consumption of 2.7 pounds of coal per indicated horse-power per hour.

From the official documents relating to the French navy we find that vessels of this class built at the same time, (1870–'74,) such, for instance, as the Champlain and Du Petit Thouars, have a maximum sea speed of 14.3 and 15.1 knots per hour, consume about 1.8 pounds of coal per indicated horse-power per hour, and carry rifled batteries vastly superior in penetrating power and range to the guns on our vessels. In an action between two fleets formed of equal tonnage of these classes of vessels the French fleet by the virtue of the superiority of more than two knots per hour in speed and in the range of their guns could take up a position beyond the range of our guns and proceed with due deliberation to worry our vessel to destruction or surrender.

The brilliant successes of our insignificant Navy in the war of 1812 were due to the superiority of speed and guns in vessels equal in tonnage to the British vessels they engaged. Victory in the future as well as in the past depends upon these same conditions.

Group 4. Vessels ordered to be rebuilt comprise what are now termed on the latest Navy list "serviceable iron-clads" on which substantial repairs were, indeed, made during Mr. ROBESON's administration. The first on the list of these so-called "serviceable iron-clads" has the suggestive name of Ajax. In answer to my resolution the Navy Department reports that $246,703 has been expended for repairs on this vessel since 1870 by the three bureaus, Steam-Engineering, Equipment and Recruiting, and Construction and Repair. We may reasonably expect, therefore, that she is now in serviceable condition, or has been performing an exceptional amount of service during the eleven years covered by this expenditure.

The service performed by her, however, consists of one trip from Philadelphia to Key West and return, and her total steaming does not exceed 2,500 miles. Just how serviceable and efficient she really is may be determined from page 2 of "statement concerning engines," &c., furnished by the Bureau of Steam-Engineering. There it is recorded that her boilers "are not worth repairing," her engines are in "fair order," and that her hull "can be repaired." The Bureau of Construction and Repair reports that she has cost to October 1, 1881, $780,842.76. The estimate for repairing this vessel is $120,000.

The second on the list of serviceable iron-clad vessels is the Canonicus. From the same sources of information (page 2, statement concerning engines, &c.) we learn that this vessel has boilers "not worth repairing," a hull that "can be repaired," and engines "in fair order." But the Bureau of Construction and Repair reports that she "requires extensive repairs." From information furnished by this bureau it appears that this vessel has cost $868,495, of which $350,000 has been expended for repairs since 1870, and she has performed no service beyond her single voyage to the Gulf and return, having steamed about 2,500 miles.

A significant fact in connection with this item for repairs on the Canonicus is the expenditure of $65,475.26 by the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting since 1870, of which $63,100 was spent in the seven years 1871–'78, $40,000 of the latter sum being spent in two years, 1874 and 1875. How such a sum could have been expended for repairs to the equipment of a monitor without masts or sails, and that had made but one short voyage, it would be impossible to explain without examining the items.

The Ajax and Canonicus are fair examples of the cost, the condition, and the service that has been rendered by these thirteen "serviceable iron-clads" since 1870.

BRITISH AND AMERICAN SHIPS COMPARED.

To avoid repetition we will now group these thirteen vessels into a fleet for the defense of any port, and compare them as such with an equal amount of British iron-clad tonnage designed and constructed before these vessels were rebuilt. The aggregate displacement of the thirteen American serviceable iron-clads is 23,510 tons; their aggregate cost has been $10,403,438. These sums do not include the cost of armament. The cost of these vessels has been, therefore, $442 per ton of displacement. In order to make the comparison with scrupulous fairness, we will select the same class of British iron-clads; that is, turreted iron-clads for coast and harbor defense. The Cyclops, Gorgon, Hecate, Hydra, Hotspur, and Rupert were designed in 1868–'70, and it has long been an open secret that they were intended for operations in American ports in case of possible war growing out of the Alabama claims' negotiations then pending. It is eminently fair, therefore, to make the comparison between our vessels rebuilt in 1870–'78 expressly for the defense of our ports, and these British vessels designed and built previously, expressly to attack them.

The aggregate displacement of the six British vessels is 23,370 tons, or 140 tons less than the aggregate of our thirteen. Their total cost was $4,756,790. This sum is exclusive of armament, and the cost of these vessels has been therefore about $203 per ton displacement, much less than one-half the cost of ours.

The next step in this comparison is that of efficiency. The measures for determining comparative efficiency of this class of vessels are, weight and penetrating power of armament, resisting power of armor, speed and maneuvering qualities, economy of motive power, fuel capacity, sea-going qualities, and crew accommodations. These are the qualifications that would decide an action. Our thirteen serviceable iron-clads mount twenty-four 15-inch and two 11-inch smooth-bore guns, weighing with the carriages 750 tons, which gives about thirty-one tons of displacement for every ton of armament.

The British fleet mounts eighteen 10-inch and two 12-inch rifles and four 64-pounders, aggregating in weight, including carriages, 590 tons, giving about 39 tons of displacement to every ton of armament. The relative powers of the two armaments are best arrived at by a comparison between the American 15-inch smooth-bore and British 10-inch rifle, and this is certainly not unfair to the American vessels.

The American 15-inch smooth-bore will penetrate or rather crush its way through 8¼ inches of solid iron armor at 1,000 yards, provided the projectile does not break up on impact. The British 10-inch rifle will penetrate 12 inches of solid iron at 1,000 yards with much less likelihood of the shot breaking up on impact. In order that the thirteen American iron-clads should be able to engage the six British ones on equal terms, considering the relative penetrating power of their armaments, the resisting power of the armor on the American vessels should be at least one and a half times that of the latter.

Instead of this we find that the British vessels have iron armor varying in thickness from 9 inches to 12 inches on the turrets and from 6 inches to 8 inches on their sides, both backed by timber from 9 inches to 14 inches thick, while the armor of our vessels nowhere exceeds 6¼ inches and is generally 3 inches to 5 inches in thickness without backing of any consequence. While the armament of the British vessels exceeds in power that of the American 37 per cent., the British armor has more than double the resisting power. The six British vessels could take up a position 1,000 yards distant from the thirteen American, and proceed to destroy them without risk of injury.

Considering that the thirteen serviceable iron-clads were rebuilt and substantially repaired expressly to defend our ports against the British fleet built to attack them, we naturally expect to find vast superiority in the next most important measure of efficiency, namely, speed and maneuvering qualities, for with superior speed our thirteen vessels would soon dispose of the six British, without regard to power of guns and resistance of armor, by doubling up on them and ramming them. Turning to the source of information on this all-important point, and accepting as accurate the American estimate both of their own and of the British vessels, we find that the maximum speed of the American vessels is recorded as from "five to six knots per hour," while the maximum speed of the slowest of the six British vessels is eleven knots per hour, or double that of the American. It does not require a trained naval mind to appreciate the advantage of double speed, double resisting power of armor, and nearly one-half more powerful armament in a naval action.

As to maneuvering qualities, double speed necessarily involves vast superiority in this respect. The disparity between our thirteen vessels and the six British becomes still more painfully apparent when the fact that ours are all single screw and the British all twin screw is stated. Twin screws enable a vessel to turn almost without change of position, while a single screw necessitates a radical change of position in order to turn the direction of the vessel's bow. With one-half the speed we may with confidence expect to find that our thirteen vessels were more economical in the consumption of coal and had much larger relative storage capacity for fuel than the six British. But even in this reasonable expectation we are doomed to disappointment. The highest consumption of coal per indicated horse-power per hour of the six British vessels is 2¾ pounds, while the lowest for the thirteen American is about 3½ pounds.

The fuel capacity of the former enables them to steam a distance of 2,300 knots, while that of the latter limits them to about nine hundred miles. A fleet composed of the six British vessels could readily steam across the Atlantic from Plymouth dock-yard to Saint John's, Newfoundland, the distance being 1,900 miles; but a fleet composed of the thirteen American vessels could not venture to steam from Boston to Saint John's, as they would have no coal left on reaching that port. These comparisons may be tedious, but they are significant in determining the relative efficiency of the two fleets for war operations.

The two remaining measures of efficiency for comparing the British and American vessels are sea-going qualities and crew accommodations. The superior sea-going qualities of the six British vessels are fully demonstrated by the fact that they have all made sea voyages without escorts, while not one of the thirteen American vessels has ever been trusted at sea without an escort and in tow. As to crew accommodations the American vessels are notoriously deficient, while the British are famous for the ample space provided for their crews. It is impossible to arrive at the exact figures, but an estimate of the cubic contents of the inhabited spaces of the two fleets indicates that the British officer and sailor are allotted three times the space that is allotted to the American.

In the event of a war with Great Britain, if we were allowed to select from the serviceable armored vessels of the British navy a fleet equal in tonnage to our thirteen "serviceable iron-clad vessels," the six vessels with which they are composed are the very ones we would select, and the last ones England would send against us, because they are regarded there as no longer efficient fighting vessels. The vessels that England could send to operate against our thirteen serviceable iron-clads are as superior to those with which our vessels have been compared as those are to our vessels. The lesson taught by all this is clearly that the officers who are responsible for spending such vast sums in repairing and rebuilding obsolete types of vessels, and in building new vessels of such inferior qualities, ought not to be trusted with the expenditure of any more money for rebuilding the Navy.

THE BUREAU SYSTEM A FAILURE.

The irresponsible bureau system has been tried and has utterly failed. The engineers and constructors who have heretofore exerted the predominant influence in the Navy Department have proved themselves unworthy of confidence and incapable of designing a modern vessel of war. They retain their powerful influence over legislation and over the Navy solely because they control the expenditure of the largest part of the naval appropriation and know how to use the secret but irresistible influence of contractors.

The time has come when an end must be made to this baneful system of administration. I have entered into this long and tedious examination of the facts disclosed by the imperfect replies to my resolution of inquiry, demonstrating that the Navy "constructed" by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] was bad in design, extravagant in cost, worthless in its results, not in order to cast obloquy on him, but in order to show that the existing system, the same system which prevailed when he was Secretary, ought to be overthrown, and that not a dollar should be appropriated for completing monitors or building new ships until a supervising board is created, to be composed of the best trained officers of the Navy in their respective departments, into whose hands the work of planning and building a new navy shall be placed. To pursue any other course is to invite a repetition of the scandals, of the blunders, and of the disgrace which are connected with the administration of the Navy since the close of the war.

ARMAMENT.

I had intended to say something in regard to guns, but the subject is too large for present treatment. But guns must precede ships. We have not a single gun in the Navy which to-day is of any real value. It will require three years to produce the first cast-steel 10-inch rifled gun for either the monitors or the new ships.

Why then worry now in an appropriation bill about monitors or new ships, when we have made and are making no provision for the armament? The condition precedent is a 100-ton steam-hammer. This does not exist in this country. It will cost a million of dollars and cannot be built in less than two or three years.

If we had an advisory board of control they would not ask for monitors or new ships now, but they would ask us to get ready to produce guns, without which ships are of no use. In this respect the appropriation bill is fatally defective, and the only safe thing is to strike out the items which give money for ships we cannot arm, and make provision for building the guns which must be ready when the ships are built.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, it was charged by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] in the course of his remarks, and it certainly has been insinuated by my colleague from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] that this appropriation bill on account of its present form has been delayed or withheld up to the present time for some improper purpose; I suppose to avoid its discussion. I deny most emphatically that the Committee on Appropriations have ever had any desire to bring this bill in at such a time in the session as to forbid it that consideration to which it is entitled, or that the committee seeks to prevent that consideration now. There have been very many good reasons in my opinion for withholding this bill, why it was not brought in at an earlier day, and that justify this side of the House, Mr. Chairman, in determining three months back the present session of Congress should accomplish some work before its adjournment other than the passing of the appropriation bills.

It was determined that the session should not end without the adoption of certain measures the majority believe to be of pressing importance to the country. There has been no design to hold back this bill or any other bill to prevent their proper consideration. That has not been the purpose; but this bill and the other appropriation bills have been held back for reasons which I have no hesitation in frankly avowing to the House and to the country. And they have never been concealed. This side of the House was disposed to compel and has compelled the consideration of certain questions, and we held back this bill, the legislative bill, and the sundry civil bill to compel that consideration. We were disposed to compel the consideration of certain election cases, the title of certain gentlemen to their seats here. We held back this bill, and the others to which I have referred, in order that we might compel their consideration, and we did compel it. We held back the bills until we had compelled the consideration of the $23,000,000 bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, which provided a reduction of about that amount in the internal revenue taxes of the country. We avowed our purpose at the time, and it was well understood. And we held back the bills for still other reasons of public importance. We compelled the consideration of the revenue bill to which I have referred; and we held back the appropriation bills until we had also compelled the consideration of the bill extending the charters of the national banks.

It was the avowed policy of this side of the House to consummate the decisions and legislation I have referred to. We believed the country demanded it of us; and we employed what we believed to be the only means at our disposal to compel it. We believed it was right; we believed it was our duty, and that wise statesmanship demanded it at our hands, and we held bills back until we had secured the consideration of public measures. The measures having been disposed of, we have brought in the appropriation bills as promptly as the House could dispose of them.

The naval appropriation bill, one of those that it was deemed advisable should be held back for the reason I have specified, is here to-day inviting the scrutiny of this committee.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to discuss this bill very much in detail; but there are certain points or certain of its features that I shall very briefly allude to. It proposes to strike down, or rather to reduce the staff and the line of the Navy. That is one of its principal features. It is perhaps radical in that direction, and we were invited to this measure upon the bill by the facts to which I now call the attention of the committee. The officers upon the active list of the Navy to-day number 2,136.

According to the report of Mr. HARRIS, chairman of the Naval Committee, we have of serviceable vessels in the Navy thirty-eight. Section 1417 of the Revised Statutes makes the entire enlisted force of the Navy, including seamen, ordinary seamen, landsmen, mechanics, firemen, coal-heavers, apprentices, and boys, 8,250. For the enlisted force, 8,250 in the aggregate. There are 2,136 staff and line officers. We have been accustomed to vote for the Navy, for its repairs, for the navy-yards and the depots, and for the pay of the Navy—for the whole establishment—we have been accustomed to vote, I say, at least the sum of $14,987,637. The proportion holds good, in the expenditure of that money, of one officer to four enlisted men; $1 in payment to the officers of the Navy out of every $4 voted to sustain the whole naval establishment.

We believed, Mr. Chairman, that we were expending upon the staff and line more money than was necessary, more than was needed with the available force of ships and men that we have. The official register of the Navy shows an increase of 50 per cent. of the line officers on vessels of war in 1882, as compared with 1864. These startling facts, Mr. Chairman, compelled the Committee on Appropriations to bring in a measure looking to the reduction of the staff and line officers of the Navy. We believe the attention of the House and of the country should be called to it, and we have brought in the pending bill the provision looking in that direction for the consideration of the House.

Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to say more upon this feature. I now desire to call attention very briefly to the work of repairing or building the vessels of the Government in the navy-yards. I can state no more than is stated in the report. Nevertheless I think it proper here and now, in this general discussion, to invite the attention of the House to the facts. The report shows that for the five years of 1877, 1878, 1879, 1880, and 1881 $10,566,171 were expended for maintaining the yards alone, while for material and labor upon the naval establishment of the Government was expended the sum of only $11,957,803.65. To keep up the yards, maintain their civil establishment, over $10,000,000 were expended in those years. And for work and labor upon our Navy, without counting the pay of the naval officers, were expended $11,957,803.65. One dollar went for salaries and for maintaining the housekeeping expenses of the Government at its yards for every dollar that went into our ships, that went into material, that went into labor.

Now, is the Committee on Appropriations to be criticised when, finding these facts before it, it has sought in some measure, in some degree, to remedy this great abuse? Was it not the duty of that committee to bring in here a bill with provisions in it which would remedy this wasteful expenditure of money and ask this House to criticise its provisions, better them if it could, but to join hands with the committee in correcting the evil? Why, Mr. Chairman, to sustain the civil establishment and for clerical force alone in the navy-yards $191,016.75 has been expended this year. Were we to submit a bill continuing this great abuse—for I do not use too strong language when I characterize it as such?

Therefore it is that this bill looks to the closing up of certain of the navy-yards, provided the Secretary of the Navy concurs in the views of the Committee on Appropriations and this House joins with the Committee on Appropriations and adopts the recommendations it has made.

We expect, Mr. Chairman, upon this question to meet with opposition. We expect to meet with local opposition alone, however. Those localities where they fear that their navy-yards may be put in peril because the Government does not need them, will join hands I doubt not in an attempt to break down this feature of the bill, and we have the right to call upon men upon both sides of this Chamber that are in favor of economy, and of making the money go as far as possible on the works of the Gowernment—we have the right to call upon both sides of the House to sustain us in the position which we have taken.

There is another fact in this connection to which I desire to draw attention. I do not know but there may be gentlemen here who will oppose the recommendations of the bill, and of the sundry civil bill, as regards the feature to which I am about to allude. The estimate for the next year for the navy-yards and docks and depots of the Government is $3,253,938. The yards and docks are out of repair, and largely out of repair, and the American Congress confronts to-day the fact that the yards and docks so far as they cannot be used with economy must either be closed or it must appropriate over $3,000,000 to repair and take care of them, preserve them and put them in a proper condition for doing work. Now, in view of the statement that it costs one dollar for salaries and for ordinary repairs to every dollar that is expended on the Navy, shall we make this appropriation of $3,253,938 for the navy-yards and docks for the coming year?

Mr. Chairman, the policy of the Forty-fourth and of the Forty-fifth and of the Forty-sixth Congresses was to cut down the appropriations, if anything, decreasing the amount from year to year that should be expended in the repairs of the Navy, and against the building of new ships. And the result has been reached as portrayed by the report of the Naval Committee—thirty-eight ships in the service and thirty-eight ships only, as I understand from the report of Mr. HARRIS, the chairman of the Naval Committee, which are serviceable.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. That is, exclusive of the fourteen iron-clads.

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, exclusive of the fourteen iron-clads. The number of the line and the staff of the Navy has been constantly increasing, and the number of effective ships has been constantly decreasing. This fact, as we believe, justified us in putting upon this bill the radical measures which have been reported in it. We would reverse the course of proceeding, and instead of increasing the line and staff of the Navy we propose to decrease them; instead of increasing the expense of the navy-yards or the expense of the Government works, we propose to stop it by closing those not needed; instead of diminishing and rendering less effective the American Navy we would make it more effective, out of the decrease in the expense of the Government yards and decrease in the pay in the line and staff of the naval force.

There is ingrafted upon this bill a provision for the completion of the monitors; we propose it in a very modest sort of a way. I do not know but that in attempting this the Committee on Appropriations has gone beyond its legitimate jurisdiction; but we believe it has not.

It seems to be agreed upon both sides of the House that if the monitors are all that is claimed for them they should be completed. Our authority for entering upon this work was the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, which has been referred to here. In addition to that we had the recommendation, unanimous, I believe, of the Committee on Naval Affairs of this House. My colleague from New York [Mr. HEWITT] has paid a deserved tribute to the chairman of that committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HARRIS.] I confess that I rely more upon his judgment than I do upon the opinions which I have found in the reports upon that subject, although so far as I have examined the question I believe the weight of authority is overwhelmingly in favor of the completion of the monitors; and I shall take occasion to insert in my remarks as they shall be printed the recommendations which I have found upon that subject, with the letter of the Secretary of the Navy and the resolution of the Naval Committee, to which I have referred:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, April 6, 1882.

Mr. TALBOTT submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Resolved, That the defense of our harbors, the preservation of our influence in America and our honor and dignity among nations all require that our Government should have at command at least a few armored ships fitted for service in the waters of our continent, and powerful alike for attack and defense; that the five double-turreted monitors now belonging to the Government and in process of completion present the general type of vessels accepted by the experience of the world as best fitted for these purposes, while their present condition and the large sums already expended upon them make their completion possible within a reasonable time and at a reasonable expense for vessels of their class and power; that the completion of these ships as promptly as the same can be economically done, with such improvements in their armor and armament as are necessary to bring them to their highest measure of efficiency, is hereby earnestly recommended, and the Appropriations Committee is respectfully requested to report, for the action of the House, an item appropriating the sum of $2,500,000 for that purpose.

Attest: EDW. MCPHERSON, Clerk.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 24, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to reply to your letter of April 19, inclosing the resolution proposed by the House Naval Committee, recommending an appropriation for completing the monitors Miantonomoh, Amphitrite, Terror, Monadnock, and Puritan, and asking my judgment on certain points stated by you relative thereto.

I. It will be wise for the Government to proceed to finish the vessels. There has already been expended on the—

Miantonomoh:
Hull	$713,605 72
Machinery	422,586 15
		$1,136,191 87
Amphitrite:
Hull	393,324 96
Boilers	110,000 00
		503,324 96
Terror:
Hull	406,774 80
Boilers	110,000 00
		516,774 80
Monadnock:
Hull	574,490 71
Boilers	110,000 00
		684,490 71
Puritan:
Hull	484,098 24
Boilers	203,700 00
		687,798 24

It would be highly censurable to waste the above sum of $3,528,580.58 by failing to finish the vessels on which it has been deliberately expended, unless some good reason for condemning them is shown. None such exists, and no person favors such condemnation. The Secretary of the Navy, Hon. R. W. Thompson, who had previously arrested work on them, stated in a communication to the House of Representatives of May 20, 1880, the conclusions of various boards carefully appointed by direction of Congress, in a joint resolution of April 2, 1880, to inquire whether it was for the interest of the Government to complete these monitors; and the Secretary then adds:

"The unanimity of opinion in reference to each of these vessels would seem to leave no room for doubt, therefore, that the interest of the Government requires the completion of all of them. In this opinion I concur for two controlling reasons:

"First. That to leave them uncompleted after so large a sum of money has been expended upon them would be bad economy, inasmuch as the loss would be very heavy to the Government; and

"Second. Because when completed they would undoubtedly be equal, if not superior, to any other vessels of their class in the world." (House Executive Document 82, part 2, Forty-sixth Congress, second session.)

II. No substantial modifications should be made in the original plans for the machinery. That of the Miantonomoh is finished, in the ship, ready for active service, and was tested by a board of engineer officers in May, 1879, and found satisfactory.

Such modifications should be made in the plan for the hulls as are recommended by the foregoing boards appointed in pursuance of the resolution of April 2, 1880.

III. The only substantial alteration in the hulls should be the substitution of steel for iron armor.

IV. The estimated cost of finishing the vessels in accordance with the present views of the Department will be for the—

Monitors.	Machinery.	Hull.
Miantonomoh	Completed.	$275,000
Amphitrite	$230,000	684,500
Terror	230,000	684,000
Puritan	420,000	839,614
Monadnock	285,000	639,222
Total	1,165,000	3,122,836
	4,287,836

V. The completion of the Miantonomoh should be proceeded with immediately. There is also no valid reason for much longer delaying work upon the other vessels. It ought not to be postponed a single day after Congress becomes convinced of the wisdom or necessity of its resumption, and should be carried forward as rapidly as it can be performed efficiently and economically.

VI. The machinery and turret-gear should be first contracted for or commenced, and should be carried well forward within the next fiscal year. The work on the armor and turrets may be delayed until the following fiscal year, although preparation therefor should be made earlier by contracting for the plating.

VII. The estimated appropriations for the next fiscal year will be as follows:

Monitors.	Machinery.	Hull.
Miantonomoh	Completed.	$275,000
Amphitrite	$185,000	455,000
Terror	185,000	455,000
Monadnock	200,000	320,000
Puritan	225,000	500,000
Total	795,000	2,005,000
	2,800,000

In conclusion, I have only to state that I agree with Secretary Thompson and the House Naval Committee in advising the completion of these five monitors, substantially on the present plans, within the shortest practicable time. Unless the United States Navy is to become antiquated and powerless, some new vessels must be built. To construct and display around the world new steel unarmored cruisers, while leaving longer unfinished these superior iron-clads, which, after absorbing $3,528,580.58, have been left without progress for five years would be a most injudicious policy.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. E. CHANDLER,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. FRANK HISCOCK,
Chairman of Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 15, 1882.

SIR: I take the liberty of writing to you to express briefly my convictions as to the value of the "monitor" class of vessels for the defense of our coast and harbors; their peculiar construction, solidity of build, together with the improved steel-faced armor, and the comparatively small surface they present to the projectiles directed against them, rendering them less liable to damage and more nearly impregnable than any class of vessels yet constructed. With these defensive qualities, their comparatively small draught of water, and the facility with which they can be handled in the shoaler waters of our harbors, would render them very effective as movable batteries, in conjunction with the fixed harbor defenses, in preventing the access to our ports of a hostile fleet of iron-clads. In the event, however, of such a fleet having successfully passed our harbor defenses and approaching our commercial cities this class of vessels could follow them up, keeping in shoal water where the hostile vessels with their great draught of water could not approach them, and they could so harass and worry those vessels as to render their position untenable, and force them almost necessarily to retire. A few rams and torpedo-boats of great speed acting in connection with them would most probably cause the destruction of such a fleet.

The Government, supplied with a number of this class of floating batteries, and having them distributed at different points upon the coast, could concentrate quickly at any point threatened by a naval attack a sufficient number of them to prevent with reasonable certainty anything more than a mere raid upon our seaboard cities.

With my strong belief in the value of this class of vessels, for the purpose named, I deem it an important policy of the Government to add gradually to their number.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN L. WORDEN,
Rear Admiral, United States Navy.

Hon. FRANK HISCOCK, M. C.,
Chairman Committee, &c., House of Representatives, Washington.

[Extract from report of Admiral David D. Porter to the Secretary of the Navy, November 6, 1874.]

Of the double-turreted monitors, the Monadnock, Miantonomoh, Amphitrite, Roanoke, and Terror (really valuable vessels) want thorough repair, and entire new hulls of iron and new engines. They could not now go with safety from port to port, although intended for sea-going vessels, and capable, when in order, of making long voyages. Some of these vessels are now under repair, and, as they may be converted into fine iron-clads, I would recommend that they be altered as follows:

I propose that their hulls should be built on the bracket-plate arrangement, like the British armor-plated vessels, and like the torpedo-boat Alarm, the latter the first vessel built on this plan in the United States.

This would give these monitors a double bottom and double frames throughout, and would enable them to carry nearly twice the thickness of iron on hull and turrets, or at least, enough to make them invulnerable against the 9, 12, and 18 ton guns generally in use in foreign navies.

If solid oak backing is used the resisting power would be still greater.

These vessels should have engines of great power and simplicity of design, of the compound type, which would enable them to cross the ocean or cruise on our coast in the heaviest weather.

Both the Monadnock and the Miantonomoh have given evidence of their ability to make long sea-voyages with comfort to officers and men, and this kind of vessel would no doubt live in a gale where an ordinary frigate would founder. In the reconstruction of these vessels I would recommend a change in the manner of revolving the turrets, either having them move on balls or rollers, or have high coamings fitted with India-rubber packing to reach to the sill of the gun port, for the present system is liable to the objection of water getting in in a sea-way. The turrets have also unreliable machinery to raise them, to say nothing of the danger of being completely disabled, while revolving on their pivot, by heavy shot.

Great diversity of opinion has existed in the minds of experienced men with regard to the best form of fighting-ship; and after examining over a hundred different plans of foreign iron-clads, I think I am justified in the conclusion that vessels like the Monadnock and Miantonomoh are better adapted for protecting our coasts and harbors and for fighting than any others yet built.

I have seen the Monadnock in all weathers and riding out heavy gales at anchor on our coast, yet she rode the sea like a duck.

This class of vessel has a fore and aft as well as a broadside fire, and no ship can be considered an efficient fighter unless so constructed.

To make these monitors more enduring against shot their plating should be solid on the sides and turrets, or each thickness of plate should be at least 5½ inches, the heaviest we are able to roll in this country. The laminated plates placed upon our vessels during the rebellion were of 1 inch thickness and adopted from necessity, we having, in the early period of the war, no rolling-machines that could turn out heavy plates.

Besides, at that time, the laminated plates were sufficient to resist the enemy's projectiles; but the solid plate has the advantage, inasmuch as so great a weight of iron is not needed when it is used, since experiments prove that a properly-rolled 4-inch plate has greater resisting power than 6 inches of laminated plates.

The double turreted monitors, when reconstructed, could be made to carry 20-inch turrets, of 5-inch plates, or thicker if they could be obtained. This would bring them down about 9 inches more in the water, and additional draught would also be caused by the side-plating, which could be remedied, however, by raising the sides, giving the vessels more free-board, and allowing height for larger boilers.

No ship is a complete fighting-vessel unless she is able to ram her antagonist, and it will be found in the event of war between two great powers that the fleet possessing the best rams, other things being equal, will win the battle.

In ramming, the crushing process is superior to the piercing, and I would recommend that the bows of our iron-clads be made very strong and especially adapted to this purpose.

The present system of naval tactics will serve very well to keep a fleet in order and to concentrate the vessels previous to an action, but when the battle commences and the ships are enveloped in smoke there is an end to order and signaling by flags, and every captain must act on orders previously given or on his own responsibility. It is evident that rams and torpedo-vessels will have matters pretty much their own way then, and the more smoke there is the better it will be for them.

It would be impossible for an enemy to avoid rams and torpedo-vessels in a dense smoke, unless continually maneuvering for the purpose, thereby breaking up the order of battle.

The decks of our monitors have hitherto been insufficiently protected. Their deck-armor should be increased to 3 inches of steel, covered with wood, for, being of rather low free-board, these vessels are liable to damage from plunging shot.

[Extracts from report of Admiral David D. Porter, November 13, 1875, to the Secretary of the Navy.]

The double-turreted monitors, however, offer a greater scope for the talents of constructors and engineers, provided they duly consider what will be required of these vessels.

* * * * * *

There is now an opportunity to commence what has long been advocated, namely, the construction of a class of vessels that could appear in line of battle, twenty-four of which would represent the naval strength of this nation, as the twenty four heaviest iron-clads of England and France indicate the naval power of those countries, and constitute a force that would drive an enemy from their shores.

* * * * * * *

For fighting purposes I prefer turreted vessles, of the monitor class, to any others; and the more I examine the various systems of foreign navies the more I am convinced that we started on the right plan for coast defense, and should now perfect it by building vessels unsurpassed in invulnerability, guns, and speed, and with a crushing power that nothing can withstand.

[Extract from Secretary Thompson's Report to Congress, May 20, 1880.]

The unanimity of opinion in reference to each of these vessels would seem to leave no room for doubt, therefore, that the interest of the Government requires the completion of all of them. In this opinion I concur for two controlling reasons:

First. That to leave them uncompleted, after so large a sum of money has been expended on them, would be bad economy, inasmuch as the loss would be very heavy to the Government; and

Second. Because when completed they would undoubtedly be equal, if not superior, to any other vessels of their class in the world.

[Extract from report of J.W. Easby, Chief of Bureau of Construction and Repair, October 26, 1877, to the Secretary of the Navy.]

The Terror, Puritan, Miantonomoh, Amphitrite, and Monadnock, all double-turreted twin-screw monitors, are in course of construction by contract; work, however, being suspended at present on all but the Miantonomoh and Monadnock. These five vessels, being the most powerful we have, should be finished without delay, and it is earnestly asked that Congress may make the required appropriation to complete them.

I would rather take the authority of the gentleman from Massachusetts after all the research he has given the question, I would rather indorse his views upon the subject as expressed upon the floor to-day, than the authority of my distinguished colleague from New York. I admit that upon this subject I am not profoundly learned; and if I must stand here and decide which of those gentlemen I must follow, I will part with my colleague from New York and tread in the steps of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

In this connection I ask the committee to consider the attitude now and heretofore of the Democratic party upon the question of giving to the country a navy. My colleague from New York says that the United States must have a navy; that he is in favor of it. He takes that position as boldly and as openly as I do. But if you bring before the House any measure to provide for building one, he places himself at the head of the opposition to it. I am willing to declare that you might allow him to write a bill to provide for building new ships, and, distinguished and patriotic as he is, he will refuse to support that bill if a Republican administration is in power.

The Democratic party had the control of this great question during the Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, and Forty-sixth Congresses, and it did nothing. When we come in here and propose to do something, they offer no proposition to improve the bill, but seek to defeat it. They say we must have new ships; this great nation must have a navy; but they say this is not the way in which the ships should be built, and that these are not the ships that should be built. And when we propose to complete ships upon which the Government has already expended over four millions of money, gentlemen on the other side spend one minute in criticising the ships and four minutes in criticising the Secretary of the Navy under whom their construction was begun years ago.

The iron-clads have been the stock in trade of the Democratic party for the last three Congresses; they have been the point at which they have chosen to attack the Republican party. The cry of fraud, of corruption, of giving money to the contractors, was commenced upon the monitors.

That subject has been fully investigated. A Democratic Congress investigated all that question fully and completely; and unless my memory is at fault the Democratic party has never brought before any Congress the facts and testimony upon which that issue could be tried.

I have not the time that I wish I had to go into this question. But I proclaim here that it is unfair and unmanly for gentlemen to bring in a side issue of this kind, when they have had six years in which they could have made an attack directly upon the Administration and have it fairly tried before Congress and before the country. In the Forty-fifth Congress, my distinguished colleague from New York [Mr. HEWITT] was on the Committee on Appropriations, I believe. I am not sure, but I think he had charge of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Never.

Mr. HISCOCK. Very well, I was mistaken in that. But there was ample opportunity under the lead of the Committee on Appropriations of that Congress, if they had chosen to do so, yes, if they had dared to do so, after all the investigation they had given the subject, to have tried in Congress and before the country the question of the merits of these ships and the legality and honesty of the contracts under which they were being builded or repaired.

They now say that they must not be completed, that they must not be finished, because they can bring one side of the case here that they were conceived in fraud; because the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE,] who I believe in the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses was chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, can bring the case of the prosecution here, when we have neither time nor opportunity to enter into an investigation of the facts; and when it is of no account if there was fraud eight years or more ago; the question and the only proper question now before Congress being, are they worth completing? Shall the Government lose the $3,500,000 or more it has expended upon them?

I have said that, relying upon the weight of the recommendation that we have found in the various reports, relying most of all upon the recommendation of the Committee on Naval Affairs, which was sent to our committee, and to which I have already referred, we have concluded that at least three of these ships should be finished, one for the Atlantic coast, one for the Gulf coast, and one for the Pacific coast.

The recommendations had been to complete them all. It has been the intention of the Committee on Appropriations to keep down the appropriations for the naval establishment. We do not care to spend more money than is necessary. We do desire to break down the system of expensive work in the yards, and also to cut off the amount now being paid to unnecessary staff and line officers, and to an unnecessary civil establishment. I believe that enough can be saved, if it is done in five years' time, to furnish this Government with as good a navy as it desires or as the people desire for it.

Mr. Chairman, I have but a word more to say; and that is in reference to still another feature of the bill—the building of new ships. Upon the other side it is said, "New ships must not be built upon an appropriation bill;" and the pillars upon which this great Government rests are trembling, in the judgment of gentlemen upon the other side, because we have inserted in this bill a provision in favor of it. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts] asked this House to give consideration to a bill looking in that direction. A majority—a large majority—of the House voted in favor of the proposition; but it was defeated (a two-thirds vote being necessary) by gentlemen on the other side who are constantly howling in favor of a navy for the United States. They are always in favor of a navy, provided a Republican administration is not to be responsible for it, or is not to have the credit of it. In view of that majority vote indorsing the bill of the gentleman from Massachusetts, we have in a modest manner put upon this bill provisions looking to the construction of two new vessels.

The bill is here to be bettered. If its provisions need to be more guarded, the Committee on Appropriations will thankfully receive suggestions from the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HARRIS.] Ay, if they need to be more guarded, and my colleague [Mr. HEWITT, of New York] agrees that ships should be built, we invite him to help us mature the provisions of the bill in that respect.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to print in the RECORD of to-morrow just such an amendment?

Mr. HISCOCK. I certainly shall not object to the gentleman printing anything that he chooses in the RECORD, but what I ask him to do, what the Committee on Appropriations ask of him is to unite with us in bettering the provisions of this bill if they can be bettered. They may be subject to criticism, but I believe that we have not violated the rules of the House; we have not exceeded our authority by incorporating in the bill provisions for building these two new ships. I yield the residue of my time to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey has forty minutes.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask to have here printed certain portions of the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs upon the present condition of our Navy:

The Naval Register last issued brings official information concerning the Navy down to January 1, 1882. The list of one hundred and forty vessels there given is made up of the following classes:

Steam-vessels:
First rates	13
Second rates	20
Third rates	27
Fourth rates, including two torpedo-boats	8
Total	68
Sailing-vessels:
Second rates	4
Third rates, first-class	6
Third rates, second-class	8
Fourth rates	5
Total	23
Iron-clads	24
Tugs	25
Total number of vessels of all classes	140

On the 10th day of January last this committee made a report (No. 139) to the House on the subject of the bill H. R. No. 677, entitled "A bill to provide a permanent construction fund for the Navy, and for other purposes," in which they give a list of eight steam-vessels which are unfinished on the stocks in the navy-yards, rotten and utterly worthless. That list is as follows:

Name.	Age.	Guns.	Tonnage.	Displacement	Location.
Connecticut	1867	21	2,869	4,450	Boston navy-yard.
Pennsylvania	1867	22	2,490	4,000	Boston navy-yard.

Massachusetts	1867	4	2,127	.....	Portsmouth, N. H.
Oregon	1867	4	2,127	.....	Boston navy-yard.
Virginia	1818	.....	2,600	4,150	Boston, partly cut down.
New Orleans	1818	.....	.....	4,150	Sackett's Harbor.

Another list is given of fourteen vessels, which includes only worn-out, obsolete, and worthless vessels, which it would be shameless folly and unpardonable extravagance to attempt to repair, having no possible present or prospective use, and which cost annually a considerable sum to guard and save from depredation by harbor thieves. That list is appended:

STEAM-VESSELS.

Name.	Age.	Guns.	Tonnage.	Displacement.	Location.
FIRST RATE.
Niagara	1855	12	2,958	5,440	Boston navy-yard.

THIRD RATE.
Narragansett	1858	5	566	1,235	Mare Island navy-yard.

FOURTH RATE.
Frolic, (purchased)	1864	8	614	1,300	Washington, D. C., navy-yard.

Still another list is given which includes eight old sailing ships and two iron-clads, all of which, with perhaps the exception of the iron-clad Dictator, are utterly worthless for naval purposes and wholly unworthy of repair. That list is as follows:

SAILING-VESSELS.

Ohio	1820	5	2,700	4,250	Boston navy-yard.
Constitution	1797 and 1876	6	1,335	2,200	League Island navy-yard.

Dictator	.....	2	1,750	4,500	League Island navy-yard.
Roanoke	.....	6	2,260	.....	Chester, Pa.

Of the twenty-five "tugs, &c.," borne on the Naval Register, the committee estimate that at least ten are worn out and useless and which should be sold or demolished. If the committee are correct in their estimate, here are forty-two out of one hundred and forty vessels of all classes whose names appear as part of the "Navy of the United States," representing not only no naval power whatever, but which can hereafter serve no useful purpose, and which are, moreover, a constant drain on the appropriations for the support of the Navy, and a consequent loss to the Government to the extent of the cost of their protection, which aggregates annually no small sum.

As an illustration, we may take the case of the Niagara, at Boston, which has been tied up to her dock, a worthless hulk, since the attempt to repair her, nearly or quite eighteen years ago, was abandoned. She has cost for her care alone since that time more than $98,000, and it is doubtful if she is worth to-day or will bring $25,000 at auction. Other instances of the same kind are numerous, and the statistics on that subject are in preparation and will be laid before Congress. We regret that we are unable to present them in this report for want of time for their completion.

From the list of one hundred and forty vessels whose names are borne on the Register forty-two thus fall out at once, without question or doubt, and we are left with a total Navy of only ninety-eight vessels of all classes. But this does not by any means tell the story of our naval weakness, for of these ninety-eight fifteen are but navy-yard tugs, which are not serviceable for war purposes. We therefore treat them as tools, useful in navy-yards and naval stations, as are other tools and machines, as a part of the plant rather than as vessels of the Navy, and we strike them out of the ninety-eight, leaving only eighty-three as the total number of our vessels of the Navy capable of service.

But our humiliation is not yet complete. Of these eighty-three fourteen are old sailing vessels of a bygone age and of an outgrown and abandoned system. We give their names, ages, tonnage, guns, and their present location and use:

* Purchased.

By deducting these our list falls from 83 to 69. These 69 include steam-vessels only and were intended for war purposes. This number must be again reduced by withdrawing the name of the Arctic ship Rogers, which was purchased for and sent out on the humane mission of rescuing lost Arctic explorers, and the names of four double-turreted iron-clad monitors, now on the stocks in the private yards of contractors at Wilmington, Chester, Philadelphia, and Mare Island, with the question of their fate still undecided, namely: Amphitrite, Puritan, Terror, and Monadnock; and also the name of the Miantonomoh, now afloat at League Island, Pennsylvania, new and in perfect condition and ready for sea; except that having neither turrets nor guns she has no excuse for going to sea. With this reduction our list falls to 63. But if we seek our present real naval power for active service at sea we must continue this dissolving view. The following table gives the names, ages, displacement, tonnage, guns, and present use of several steam-vessels of the Navy, some of which are not in present condition for service, some of which can never be made so, and all of which are of very doubtful value to the service:

Name.	When built.	Guns.	Tonnage.	Displacement.	Present location, condition, and use.
Franklin	1854	39	3,173	5,170	Receiving-ship at Norfolk.
Colorado	1855	46	3,032	4,700	Receiving-ship at New York.
Minnesota	1835	46	3,000	4,700	Training-ship at Newport, Rhode Island.
Wabash	1854	45	3,000	4,650	Receiving-ship at Boston.
New York	1865	21	2,490	4,070	A frame on the stocks at New York; live oak; worthy of being finished.
Iowa	1865	25	2,019	4,000	Probably worthless; at Boston; machinery taken out; white oak; built at close of the war; very fast; did no service.
Antietam	1865	21	2,490	4,000	A mere hulk; at League Island; white oak; launched in 1874; used as store-ship and marine barracks; no machinery on board.
Michigan	1844	8	450	685	Iron paddle-wheel lake boat at Erie, Pa.; should give place to a vessel of war to fill treaty rights of United States.

Names of vessels, when built, guns, tonnage, &c.—Continued.

Name.	When built.	Guns.	Tonnage.	Displacement.	Present location, condition, and use.
Tallapoosa	1863 and 1874	2	650	1,270	A transport used by Navy Department; lately repaired; a good vessel and useful to the Government in this service.
Dispatch	Purchased.	4	730	.....	A mere dispatch vessel; a purchased pleasure yacht; fast, and useful to the Government in this service.
Intrepid	1870	.....	311	800	Built for torpedo service; strong and able, but too slow; could be made useful if completed; no torpedo machinery on board.

It is manifest that these vessels can be of little, if any practical service in actual war, and we deduct them from our list, which reduces the Navy to fifty-two. But of this reduced number fourteen are of the single turreted monitor class, not suited for cruising service, and only to be relied upon for coast and harbor defense. They are good vessels of their class, have been rebuilt of iron, or rather have had their old wooden beams replaced with iron since the war. Whether good or bad, they are all we have in the nature of iron-clad harbor defenders afloat and armed, and yet there is not one breech-loading rifled gun of any size in the entire fleet. They are all armed with smooth-bore guns of large caliber, but of small power and short range. They did good service during the war in a contest with an enemy which had no navy. Some of them bear the scars of war, and are objects of respect and veneration, but it is unsafe longer to rely on them as our sole defense against the powerful navies of modern times. They are all classed as fourth-rates, and are as follows, with their guns, tonnage, &c.:

Name.	When built.	Guns.	Tonnage.	Displacement.	Location.
Ajax	1865	2	550	2,100	City Point, James River.
Canonicus	1864	2	550	2,100	Navy-yard, Pensacola.
Camanche	1865	2	496	1,875	In ordinary, Mare Island, California.
Catskill	1863	2	496	1,875	City Point.
Jason	1863	2	496	1,875	League Island, Pennsylvania.
Lehigh	1866	2	496	1,875	City Point.
Mahopac	1864	2	550	2,100	City Point.
Manhattan	1864	2	550	2,100	City Point.
Montauk	1863	2	496	1,875	In commission, Washington.
Nahant	1863	2	496	1,875	League Island.
Nantucket	1863	2	496	1,875	Annapolis, Maryland.
Passaic	1862	2	946	1,875	Receiving-ship, Washington.
Sangus	1864	2	550	2,100	Laid up at Washington.
Wyandotte	1866	2	550	2,100	In commission, Washington.

We have now left to account for only thirty-eight vessels, and in this number is to be found all the naval power for ocean service of the United States. We annex a table of these thirty-eight vessels, their ages, tonnage, displacement, and guns, their present service, or location, if out of active service. We give them by classes as they stand in the Register:

FOURTH RATE.
Alarm	1873	311	1,550	1	1 s. b., 15-inch	In commission at Washington.

It may seem useless to further point out the weakness of our Navy, but it is best that the whole truth be known now, so that we who have the responsibility for the future peace and safety of the country upon us may have the perils and dangers of neglect of present duty clearly before us. A careful examination of the last table, in which is displayed the whole of our offensive naval power, will satisfy any person that many of the vessels there named are old and nearly worn out, slow in speed, feeble in offensive power, and utterly deficient in defensive power, even in the power of running away from danger, and which, when war comes, will only be safe behind fortifications or unapproachable harbors.

The Powhatan will serve as an illustration. She is our second ship in size in active service and is at the head of our list of second rates. She was built in 1850—more than thirty years ago—and is propelled when under steam by the paddle-wheel, which is now seldom seen at sea. She is little more than a sailing vessel with auxiliary steam-power. She could not fight with the smallest vessel of our Navy. The little torpedo-boat Alarm, with her one smooth-bore 15-inch gun and more rapid speed and her wonderful capacity of so maneuvering as always to keep her sharp deflective armored prow and great gun to the front, would be an antagonist with which the Powhatan would never successfully engage. And if, in addition to her gun, the Alarm would bring her bow torpedo into play, in a contest with the Powhatan, the trial would end in a few minutes by the sinking of that first of our second-rate vessels of war.

The Omaha, the Plymouth, the Ossipee, and other of our vessels are now out of active service, awaiting destruction or repair as future necessity or policy shall determine, and it is extremely doubtful whether a wise economy does not dictate their abandonment as vessels of war. The Lancaster has lately been rebuilt at enormous cost, and we cannot but entertain a doubt whether every dollar spent upon her has not been wasted. She is really a new ship, and in many respects better than she was at first, but she is a new ship on an old and outgrown model, and possessed of but few of the qualities required in modern cruising vessels of war. It is often said of her, that she is a fine ship in times of peace.

But we have little respect for a ship of war which is only good in times of peace. Profound respect is paid to that ship in times of peace or war which is ready for war, and such vessels, and such only, few in numbers though they may be perhaps, are those which this country can afford to maintain. One such vessel is worth a whole navy of obsoletes. The Hartford is undergoing the same process at large cost and will soon be completed, but when finished and afloat she will be only a new ship on an old plan, as good as before and no better. The progress of an age has been made—an age of startling development in war and the arts of naval architecture—since she was conceived and brought into being. When she first took the sea and proudly bore her flag she was the equal in speed and in offensive and defensive power of any vessel of her class in the world. When she achieved her victories and won glory for herself and immortal fame for her great commander, she was but five years old and as good as any vessel of her class afloat. She was built of wood, and so were most of the war ships of her time.

Other vessels have within a few years been brought back from "rotten row" into the service in the same way and at great cost. The process may go on indefinitely unless a different and wiser policy is now established.

Had the money which has thus been expended (and properly expended in the absence of authority of Congress to make wiser use of it, perhaps) been applied to the completion and armament of our double-turreted iron-clad monitors we should not now be, as we confessedly are, helpless to defend our own shores and great commercial centers against the attack of the smallest nation of the earth which may have had the courage and wisdom to buy and to fit out a modern iron-clad vessel of war effectively armed.

The double-turreted iron-clad monitor Monadnock is now on the stocks in the private ship-yard of Mr. Burgess, at Vallejo, California, half finished. She was intended to be a defense for the city of San Francisco and the west coast. The money which has been expended in rebuilding obsoletes of wood since work on the Monadnock was suspended would have finished and armed that vessel with the most powerful guns of modern times, and San Francisco, the great center of our Pacific commerce, would be in no danger from any enemy. We are not probably in danger of falling into new difficulty with Chili; but that people have just passed through a great war with Peru. They are flushed with victory. They may, like other nations under similar circumstances, feel able to resent supposed insults, and may treat gentle expostulation as intended threat. War generally comes without sufficient cause and with short notice. Should Chili find cause to make war on us she would have it all her own way from the start, and in one day would inflict greater injury upon our people than the cost of fifty Monadnocks could repay. Chili has three European-built iron-clads in her navy, namely:

Name of vessel.	Thickness of armor, in inches.	Displacement, in tons.	Speed, in knots.	Number and description of guns.	Remarks.
Almirante Cochrane.	4½ to 9	3,560	12.8	6 9-inch 12½-ton guns.	Full sail-power.
Blanco Encalada ..	4½ to 9	3,560	12.8	6 9-inch 12½-ton guns.	Full sail-power.
Huascar	4½ to 5½	1,100	11	2 300-pdrs 4 40-pd'rs.	Captured from Peru.

"The United States naval force on this—the South Pacific—station consists of 4 unarmored wooden vessels, namely, Pensacola, (flag-ship,) Alaska, Lackawanna, and Adams. The Pensacola can make 8 knots per hour; the Alaska, 11 knots; the Lackawanna, 8 knots; and the Adams, 11 knots. Not one of these vessels could either overtake or run away from the Almirante Cochrane or the Blanco Encalada. The entire squadron is not of sufficient force to compete successfully with even one of these two iron-clads, and not of sufficient speed to avoid a hopeless conflict."

It is manifest that in a conflict with this small nation the United States would be helpless to resist the first attack, the most important thing to do in war always, and Chili could levy tribute on the city of San Francisco or seal up the Golden Gate as with an iron wall.

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Chairman, in the performance of my duty as chairman of the sub-committee reporting this bill, I have in the forty minutes allowed me two roads before me, one of which I must choose. Debate in opposition to the bill has divided itself, or has been divided by those who made it, into two branches—one consisting of attacks upon the bill and its propositions; the other embracing attacks upon its humble advocate, his character, and his history. "I perceive here a divided duty;" but I recognize that it is first incumbent on me to discharge, regardless of my personal feelings and inclinations, my duty to the committee and to the country in explanation of the provisions of the bill itself, and to postpone if need be to a later opportunity (which may come before this bill is entirely disposed of) the pursuit of that path of personal interest which perhaps I ought to enter upon. I have been associated with members of this House, some of them for many years—all of them during the present Congress, most of them during two Congresses. My character and my conduct have been observed by you all. You are familiar with my public processes; you are acquainted with my personal demeanor. I can safely trust my character for two or three days in your hands until I have discharged more pressing duties. I do but repeat, perhaps, in substance the remark of a distinguished statesman when I say that what I have been in character and in principle I am, and what I am I expect to continue to be. Circumstances and opponents may defeat my efforts and overcome my purposes; but they shall not defeat my self-respect nor overcome my temper.

With these remarks, gentlemen, I shall proceed at present to the consideration of the provisions of this bill. The principal point of attack has been the building of the double-turreted monitors. Upon those I wish to say to all men that I consider myself responsible for them. I shall shelter myself in no degree behind the responsibility of any man, living or dead. The repairs of those monitors—for they are called repairs in conformity with the practice of the Navy Department, since that Department commenced, when it undertook to thoroughly repair or even completely rebuild a ship which had a name and position upon the Navy Register—those repairs were entered upon in the year 1874. They were entered upon in accordance with the recommendation of Admiral Porter. I hold in my hand his recommendation on that subject, which is quoted in the report of the committee. I will take time to read a sentence of it:

Of the double-turreted monitors, the Monadnock, Miantonomoh, Amphitrite, Roanoke, and Terror (really valuable vessels) want thorough repair, and entire new hulls of iron and new engines.

Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] complains that while those new engines were being built, and while the new iron frames for the new hull were being rolled at the workshops on the Delaware, the old hull was not floated down; and he says no man can pretend that a vessel was being repaired while she was twenty miles away from the shops. Why, her iron plates and beams must be rolled, all her material must be prepared, before being put together.

If anything is done with her engines and her machinery, that must be done at the workshop, and not on board the ship. How ridiculous this flimsy pretense seems when tried by common reason and ordinary practical sense!

I propose—

Says Admiral Porter—

that their hulls should be built on the bracket-plate arrangement, like the British armor-plated vessels, like the torpedo-boat Alarm, the latter the first vessel built on this plan in the United States.

Their hulls were built on that arrangement exactly as they were recommended. Such were the plans, such are the results.

This would give these monitors a double bottom and double frames throughout, and would enable them to carry nearly twice the thickness of iron on hull and turrets, or, at least, enough to make them invulnerable against the nine, twelve, and eighteen ton guns generally in use in foreign navies.

They have double bottoms and double frames throughout, exactly as recommended.

If solid oak backing is used the resisting power would be still greater.

Solid oak backing is provided.

These vessels should have engines of great power and simplicity of design, of the compound type, which would enable them to cross the ocean or cruise on our coast in the heaviest weather.

They have new engines of simple design of the compound type, with twin screws to make them turn almost upon their center, and will be able to cross the ocean, or at least to navigate along our coast and the waters of this continent, with perfect safety.

Both the Monadnock and the Miantonomoh have given evidence of their ability to make long sea-voyages with comfort to officers and men, and this kind of vessel would no doubt live in a gale where an ordinary frigate would founder. In the reconstruction of these vessels I would recommend a change in the manner of revolving the turrets.

That also is provided for.

Great diversity of opinion has existed in the minds of experienced men with regard to the best form of fighting-ship, and after examining over a hundred different plans of foreign iron-clads, I think I am justified in the conclusion that vessels like the Monadnock and Miantonomoh are better adapted for protecting our coasts and harbors, and for fighting, than any others yet built.

I have seen the Monadnock in all weathers, and riding out heavy gales at anchor on our coast, yet she rode the sea like a duck.

To make these monitors more enduring against shot, their plating should be solid on the sides and turrets, or each thickness of plate should be at least five and a half inches.

Their armor is solid. It is twelve inches on the turrets and seven inches, I think, on the armor of the sides, fulfilling, and more than fulfilling, the recommendation of the Admiral.

No ship is a complete fighting-vessel unless she is able to ram her antagonist, and it will be found in the event of war between two great powers that the fleet possessing the best rams, other things being equal, will win the battle.

These vessels are so constructed that they are to be used with rams, with all the immense weight of their hulls and machinery; their bows are so fixed that they are to act as rams according to this recommendation.

The decks of our monitors have hitherto been insufficiently protected. Their deck-armor should be increased to three inches of steel covered with wood.

Their deck-armor is increased. Then from his next report he says:

The double-turreted monitors, however, offer a greater scope for the talents of constructors and engineers, provided they duly consider what will be required of these vessels.

* * * * * * *

For fighting purposes I prefer turreted vessels, of the monitor class, to any others; and the more I examine the various systems of foreign navies, the more I am convinced that we started on the right plan for coast defense, and should now perfect it by building vessels unsurpassed in invulnerability, guns, and speed, and with a crushing power that nothing can withstand.

And now when these monitors have been built exactly on those plans, when they have been found to be successes by actual experiment, because after they were questioned here by an interest which I will not characterize, after it was said by experts, Mr. Lenthall and Mr. Isherwood, they would sink if launched, the Miantonomoh was finished, clothed with armor, fully finished to her oil-cups, with nothing left to put on her but her turrets, with weights absolutely calculated and calculable, with her engines and machinery in her, "and she floats like a duck," to use the phrase of Admiral Porter, from a foot to eighteen inches higher out of water than was calculated.

And yet these very men upon whose authority we are now asked to condemn the sister vessels of the Miantonomoh gave as their solemn opinion as experts that she would sink when launched. These other vessels, except the Puritan, are sister ships exactly, line for line, inch for inch, weight for weight, with this difference in favor of the others that the Miantonomoh is armored with iron, that the new ones may be armored with steel, lighter, with more floating capacity than even the Miantonomoh.

All this subject-matter was examined over and over again. Board after board has been appointed to investigate it. Eighteen officers in the various bureaus, line officers, rear-admirals, commodores, engineers, naval constructors—five engineers, I believe, and four contractors—have all recommended the completion of these vessels, saying that, with small modifications which they recommended, principally in the character and arrangement of the armor, but only amounting to about $12,000, they will be the best vessels we can have. But one single person appears upon the record, Mr. John Lenthal, as opposing them, and upon him the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] take their stand.

Now, Mr. Lenthal, like Mr. Hanscomb, is dead. I have nothing to say against him. But I do say that he was an old ship-builder of the ship-carpenter type; and when the original Monitor was proposed to be built he threw so many obstructions in its way during the war that it had to be taken from the Bureau of Construction and Repair, of which he was the head, and given to the Bureau of Yards and Docks, under old Admiral Joe Smith; that the only vessels that were built by that bureau in the shape of iron-clads were what were called the river and harbor monitors, which before they were even finished had to be raised in their free-boards, being the origin of the claims of the iron-clad contractors of that period of which we have heard so much, and twenty-two other vessels. What were they? They were the light-draught monitors built under the supervision of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, with Mr. Lenthal at its head, and the Bureau of Steam-Engineering, of which Mr. Isherwood was the head; and when they came to be launched it was found they were absolutely good for nothing. They would not carry guns or men, but they flooded their decks under water before they had any stores or armor on board; and yet in the face of that fact this is the authority, standing alone and unsupported against all of these other naval authorities, upon which we are asked to condemn the monitors.

Mr. Chairman, the Naval Committee in the last Congress—the Democratic Naval Committee—examined this whole subject, examined the contractors, visited the navy-yards, examined these ships, took testimony upon the subject, and passed a resolution that they ought to be finished, which resolution I believe, although I speak only from memory, and I do not know that I am correct about it, was reported to this House by Hon. John Goode, of Virginia.

I know that it was proposed, at all events, to be put on as an amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill in the second session of the last Congress but was ruled out on the point of order. The present Naval Committee have visited also these ships and examined the subject carefully; and their investigation has led them to adopt a resolution recommending their finishing, upon the ground that it is necessary they should be finished for the honor and for the dignity of our country and for our influence upon our continent on both its shores, as well as for the best protection and command of our harbors and coast lines.

These general remarks, Mr. Chairman, will be all that I shall submit upon that branch of the subject. I will let them stand as an appeal, not only to the good sense of this committee, but to its patriotism and its honor, as I will let them stand an appeal to the patriotism and the honor of the American people.

Mr. ATKINS. If the gentleman from New Jersey will not consider it an interruption, and if he does I will not ask the question, I would like to have him state if the committee is to understand him to say that the Mullany board and the Stevens board both recommended the completion of these five vessels?

Mr. ROBESON. The gentleman will understand me to say that the naval board——

Mr. ATKINS. And if the gentleman has the data or has the reports of these boards I would like very much for him to read them.

Mr. ROBESON. I have neither the publication of the Mullany board nor of the Stevens board, but I have here the report of the board appointed by Mr. Secretary Thompson, and their recommendations are quoted in the report accompanying this bill, or rather a quotation from that board and its report upon that subject, which I will read. Here is what Mr. Thompson says upon that subject in a communication addressed to Congress on the 20th of May, 1880, the conclusion of the various boards upon the subject by direction of Congress under a joint resolution of April 2, 1882, to inquire whether it was for the interest of the Government to complete these monitors. The Secretary adds:

> The unanimity of opinion in reference to each of these vessels would seem to leave no room for doubt, therefore, that the interest of the Government requires the completion of all of them. In this opinion I concur——

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment; I wish to ask if he has finished the sentence in Secretary Thompson's report to which he has referred?

Mr. ROBESON. I am proceeding to complete it.

> That the interest of the Government requires the completion of all of them. In this opinion I concur for two controlling reasons.

Mr. BLOUNT. Now, I would ask the gentleman from New Jersey, if he will allow me, if the Secretary does not call attention to the fact that in his opinion these should be completed only upon condition that modifications should be made in the original plans for their construction?

Mr. ROBESON. All right. I am ready to come to that in a moment.

> In this opinion I concur for two controlling reasons:
> First. That to leave them uncompleted, after so large a sum of money has been expended upon them, would be bad economy, inasmuch as the loss would be very heavy to the Government; and,
> Second. Because when completed they would undoubtedly be equal, if not superior, to any other vessels of their class in the world.

Now I go on—

> No substantial modifications should be made in the original plans for the machinery. That of the Miantonomoh is finished, in the ship, ready for active service, and was tested by a board of engineer officers in May, 1879, and found satisfactory.
> Such modifications should be made in the plan for the hulls as are recommended by the foregoing boards appointed in pursuance of the resolution of April 2, 1880.
> The only substantial alteration in the hulls should be the substitution of steel for iron armor.

Is that what the gentleman from Georgia was calling attention to?

Mr. BLOUNT. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. ROBESON. I only asked if that was what the gentleman was calling attention to.

Mr. BLOUNT. I did not hear that part of what the gentleman read.

Mr. ROBESON. That is the opinion of R. W. Thompson, against whom even the gentleman on the other side cannot find it in his heart to make even the faintest insinuation.

You will find that this recommendation of the committee does not affect the hulls of these ships at all. What does it provide for? It provides, first, that the turrets shall be put on the Miantonomoh, a ship which is completed and pronounced satisfactory, and waits only for her turrets. It is supposed they will be put on of steel or steel-faced armor, making them capable of resisting anything that can cross the ocean and enter our harbors. Second, we provide what, with regard to the other ships, will cost from $250,000 to $275,000. For the other four ships we provide that they shall be launched. They are now, and have been for five or six years, in the dock-yards of private owners, but we have refused either to pay for the occupation of their yards or to permit them to go on and finish the ships. The bill provides they shall be launched; that they shall be launched to the best advantage, so that whatever armor may be found necessary, upon further examination, can be put on either at the navy-yards or wherever it is best to do it.

Third. What does it provide? That the engines and the machinery of at least two of them shall be finished. But, says Secretary Thompson, nobody has ever complained of the engines, not even Lenthall and Isherwood; not even the gentleman from New York; not even the member from Tennessee. And yet that is all we provide. To finish the Miantonomoh; that is, to finish her turrets and to put in the engines and machinery, which is comparatively inexpensive and will not take long time. And to finish two others, one on the California and one on the Atlantic coast. Is there anything wrong in that recommendation? Is there anything in it that does not appeal to the common sense of honest men? Is there anything in it that does not appeal to and challenge the patriotism of every man who loves his country, its dignity, and its honor?

If we had had the Monadnock finished last summer she could have floated into the harbor of Callao; she could have been on the coast of Peru, and a sister republic need not have been dismembered for the purpose of filling the pockets of English dealers and contractors. We could have dominated the situation if we are to build a canal across the Isthmus. These are the ships that could with safety ride through a gale that would founder a frigate, says Admiral Porter. They would represent the interests in that quarter of the dominant and responsible nation of the western hemisphere.

I am advocating no policy. But to be respectable and respected a nation must be powerful. To be yielded to in her principles and in her policy she must have the means to enforce them against all comers. This is a small expenditure. One million of dollars for the great American Republic with an overflowing Treasury towards maintaining the dignity and the honor, the influence and the power of the Republic, and the member from Tennessee and the gentleman from New York oppose it—on what ground? I leave you to imagine.

Mr. Chairman, there are other points in this bill which I ought to discuss. We provide for shutting up substantially several of the navy-yards where work is being done. The statistics of the Navy Department show that during the last five years—and I quote the figures for those years only because it is convenient, the system was just as vicious under my control as it was under that of my successors, but I could not escape from it any more than they could—the statistics show that in the last five years for $11,950,000, or near that sum, expended in labor and materials in the various navy-yards on the Atlantic coast, $10,500,000 was expended in the maintenance of the yards and the civil service necessary to expend that labor. If you have a business worth $100,000, and yet it takes you $99,000 to pay your store rent and your clerks, that is the difficulty; I cannot help it.

I live nearer a navy-yard than any man in this House. When I look out of the window of my home I have before me the flag that flies upon the League Island Navy-Yard, nearer to it than the gentleman from Philadelphia, [Mr. O'NEILL,] who has spoken on this subject—nearer to it than any other man here. But I cannot, as a faithful representative of the people, I cannot, as a representative of the great party which declares and means reform, the Republican party of the country, I cannot, when I have the power, forbear to do what I can toward rationally and calmly and deliberately putting such pressure as an appropriations committee may upon this subject, so as to compel the concentration of the work in the few points which will greatly enlarge the efficiency of the appropriation and make $400,000 or $800,000 go a great deal further.

If it takes $10,500,000 to expend $11,900,000 upon our Navy, then if you cut down the civil establishment and the expense of the maintenance of the yards to half the present amount, you will save half of that sum; and $400,000 will grow into $600,000 or $750,000 in the hands of economical managers.

I appeal to the Republicans of this House, can we afford, on a mere question of personal patronage or of local interest, to strike at the very central idea of our party? Which is the better on the whole for everybody, to do right and command support, or to do wrong and buy support? I put that question to gentlemen of the House of Representatives.

Another suggestion. In the fifteen years since the war, or fourteen years, if you choose, about thirty ships in the American Navy have been built and rebuilt and substantially repaired. I have no time now to refer to the papers to confirm exactly what I state. They were all built and rebuilt during the eight years that I was in that Department. Everything that there is to-day that carries the flag of the American Republic in the face of the world was built by me or under my supervision, and I am responsible for it.

Since the Democratic party has been in power in this House, under the lead of the member from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE,] not a ship has been built nor a single gun put afloat.

A MEMBER. Except the Nipsic.

Mr. ROBESON. The Nipsic was substantially finished when I left her; she has been launched since. She was rebuilt, gentlemen say, contrary to law. I say that if there were any doubts, and there are none, if there were any doubts in the construction of the law I resolved them in favor of my country, and I will stand before the world taking that responsibility.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have his time extended.

Mr. ROBESON. I have no right to that, and do not ask it.

Mr. ELLIS. Unanimous consent can do anything.

The CHAIRMAN. The extension of time cannot be granted by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBESON. I do not ask it. I only ask the indulgence of the House for one minute longer, to say that under the policy of the Democratic party, as represented by the member from Tennessee, in reference to the Navy, $73,000,000 have been spent in the last five years, and not a ship launched except the Nipsic which I had finished, and not one new gun put afloat. [Great applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed by the House for general debate upon this bill has been exhausted. The Clerk will now proceed to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the naval service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes:

For the pay of the Navy, for the active list, namely: For one Admiral, one Vice-Admiral, twelve rear-admirals, eight chiefs of bureau, twenty-four commodores, forty-nine captains, eighty-nine commanders, eighty lieutenant-commanders, two hundred and eighty lieutenants, one hundred and one masters, one hundred ensigns, eighty-two midshipmen, fifteen medical directors, fourteen medical inspectors, fifty surgeons, seventy-nine passed assistant surgeons, ten assistant surgeons, twelve pay-directors, thirteen pay-inspectors, fifty paymasters, thirty passed assistant paymasters, twenty assistant paymasters, sixty-nine chief engineers, one hundred passed assistant engineers, thirty-five assistant engineers, seventy-three cadet-engineers, (graduates,) twenty-four chaplains, twelve professors of mathematics, ten naval constructors, seven assistant naval constructors, ten civil engineers, one hundred and ninety-one warrant-officers, forty-one mates, two hundred and one cadet-midshipmen, (on probation,) one hundred and two cadet-engineers, one hundred and thirty cadet-midshipmen, (not graduates;) in all, $4,044,500: Provided, That hereafter there shall be no appointments of cadet-midshipmen or cadet-engineers at the Naval Academy, but in lieu thereof naval cadets shall be appointed from each Congressional district and at large as now provided by law for cadet-midshipmen, and all the undergraduates at the Naval Academy shall hereafter be designated and called "naval cadets;" and from those who successfully complete the four years' course at the academy appointments shall hereafter be made as it is necessary to fill vacancies in the lower grades of the line and various staff corps of the Navy and of the Marine Corps: And provided further, That no greater number of appointments into these grades shall be made each year than shall equal the number of vacancies which has occurred in the same grades during the preceding year; such appointments to be made from the graduates of the year, at the conclusion of their four years' course at the academy, in the order of merit, as determined by the academic board of the Naval Academy; the assignment to the various corps to be made by the Secretary of the Navy upon the recommendation of the academic board; and if there be a surplus of graduates from the academy those who do not receive such appointment shall be given a certificate of graduation, an honorable discharge, and one year's sea-pay as now provided by law for cadet-midshipmen.

Mr. ROBESON. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to move sundry amendments to the paragraph just read. In line 43, on page 3 of the printed bill, I move to strike out the word "four" and insert "six;" also, in the same line, strike out the words "at the Academy," so that it will read "at the conclusion of their six years' course, in the order of merit," &c.; also, in line 48, strike out the words "from the Academy," so that it will read "and if there be a surplus of graduates, those who do not receive such appointment," &c.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. ELLIS. I move to amend line 16 of the bill by inserting, after the word "surgeons," the words "two assistant-surgeons not in the line of promotion," so that it will read "ten assistant-surgeons, two assistant-surgeons not in the line of promotion, twelve pay directors," &c. I also move to amend line 27 so as to make the appropriation $4,048,300. The reason for these amendments is this: the Forty-sixth Congress passed an enabling act authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Dr. Thomas Owens and Dr. William Martin assistant-surgeons in the Navy of the United States not in the line of promotion. They have passed their examination, have been confirmed by the Senate and commissioned by the President, and are now on duty, one at New Orleans and one in this city. The bill as reported fails to provide for their payment, and this amendment is simply to provide for the pay of these two officers, and I understand it is acceptable to the entire Committee on Appropriations.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I move to strike out all of the pending paragraph from and including the word "provided" in line 27 of the printed bill to the end of the paragraph, as amended by the committee. The portion proposed to be struck out is as follows:

Provided, That hereafter there shall be no appointments of cadet-midshipmen or cadet-engineers at the Naval Academy, but in lieu thereof naval cadets shall be appointed from each Congressional district and at large, as now provided by law for cadet-midshipmen, and all the undergraduates at the Naval Academy shall hereafter be designated and called "naval cadets;" and from those who successfully complete the four years' course at the Academy appointments shall hereafter be made as it is necessary to fill vacancies in the lower grades of the line and various staff corps of the Navy and of the Marine Corps: And provided further, That no greater number of appointments into these grades shall be made each year than shall equal the number of vacancies which has occurred in the same grades during the preceding year; such appointments to be made from the graduates of the year, at the conclusion of their six years' course, in the order of merit, as determined by the academic board of the Naval Academy; the assignment to the various corps to be made by the Secretary of the Navy upon the recommendation of the academic board. And if there be a surplus of graduates, those who do not receive such appointment shall be given a certificate of graduation, an honorable discharge, and one year's sea-pay as now provided by law for cadet-midshipmen.

The object of my amendment is to strike out that new legislation in this bill which proposes to change the entire engineer corps of the Naval Academy. I do not think that the last hours of the session on an appropriation bill is the time or the place to change a system which has been in successful operation for sixteen years.

I trust this portion of the bill will be stricken out, and that the Naval Academy will remain as it is to-day, a school for cadet-midshipmen and cadet-engineers, and that in the future the Committee on Naval Affairs of this House will mature a bill which will reduce and very largely reduce the personnel of the Navy.

The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] has said that the number of the line officers of the Navy was entirely too great. I most heartily agree with the gentleman in that statement, and I say here and now that if the Committee on Appropriations desired to make any reduction, they should have made a very much more extensive reduction in the force of line officers, and not have been content with a sweeping reduction of the engineer and other staff officers.

When the distinguished gentleman from New York says that the staff corps of the Navy is larger than it was in 1864, I desire to take issue with him. When he says that the line of the Navy is larger than it was in 1864, I heartily agree with him. The unfortunate thing about this bill is that while it strikes down the staff corps, a corps which has a larger proportion of its officers on active duty than any other—while it strikes that corps down in some instances from 50 to 100 per cent., including the engineers, it does not at all reduce directly the number of the line officers of the Navy, which is greatly in excess of the needs of the Navy.

I find by reference to the Navy Registers that in 1864, in time of war, when every one of our vessels was supposed to be fully manned, we had on the steamship Lancaster eleven line officers, and we now have thirty. We had twelve staff officers; we now have eleven. On the steamers Hartford and Pensacola we had sixteen line officers in time of war, when the ships were fully manned; now we have twenty-six line officers, in time of peace. Engineer officers in 1864, ten; in 1882, six. The same disproportion exists in all our vessels. The staff has not been increased, but, in some cases, reduced. The proportion of staff officers doing sea-service to-day is largely in excess of any other corps. Yet the gentleman from New Jersey in reporting this bill allows the line to remain substantially just where it is, with all its great force of officers in time of peace, and strikes down the staff corps, especially the engineer force, and this against the protest of the engineer-in-chief, indorsed by the Secretary of the Navy.

While I agree to a reduction, while I wish a much larger reduction, I would like to see the reduction begin where it should, with the largely excessive force of line officers. I heartily favor the feature of the bill which retains in the service only enough graduates to fill vacancies.

On January 1, 1882, with two hundred and seventy-three engineer officers, including forty cadet-engineers, we had on sea service a larger proportion than of any other corps, and yet no more than the Secretary of the Navy and the engineer-in-chief say were necessary. We have 52 per cent. of the engineer corps on sea service, but only 48 or 49 per cent. of the line. If we are to reduce at all, we should reduce where the reduction will tell in the interest of economy and fair play. We must not allow a bill to come in here framed insidiously—I venture to say this because there has been and is a jealousy between the line and the staff, between the line and the engineer officers of the Navy—we must not allow a bill to come in here insidiously designed, I fear, to weaken the engineer corps and wipe out the best school of mechanical and marine engineering in the world. Consideration and due reflection should be given by the House to such radical changes in existing law.

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Chairman, the provision in the bill amounts to this: that the Corps of Engineers—the officers of the staff and those of the line—shall all be graduates of the Naval Academy. The gentleman proposes to strike out this provision, but suggests nothing in its place. The idea of the Committee on Appropriations was that, to prevent all the differences of opinion, all the antagonisms which have grown up in the service, much to its detriment, it is best that all these officers should have the same mode of appointment, the same course of study, the same certificate of graduation, the same recommendation and examination for the service; that upon the recommendation of the academic board they should go into the particular branches of the service to which their talents or natural aptitude may best adapt them; that after graduating from the academy they should all go to sea together, not knowing themselves who were to be engineers or who line officers; that every young cadet should take his turn in the engine-room, every future engineer should take his watch on deck, so that those who are to control the motive power of the ship may know something about her command on deck, and those who are to be deck officers may know something of the power and capacity of the engines; that afterward those who are assigned to staff duty, such as the engineer service, should pursue a special course of study and training with reference to that particular duty.

Now, it is admitted that there are too many officers in both branches of the Navy. There are one hundred and twenty more engineer officers in the service than there were in 1870. This bill reduces the number to one hundred, but not by striking at any man who is in the service. We propose by this section, when it shall have been perfected according to the views of the committee, to provide that there shall be no reduction in the higher grades. We propose to strike out "thirty-five," in reference to the engineers, and substitute "forty-five." We propose not to strike at anybody who is in the service; we leave all who are there.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to strike out the last word and yield my time to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON.]

Mr. ROBESON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] says that we propose no reduction in the officers of the line. We do. All the cadets who are appointed to the Naval Academy to-day go into the line. The naval cadets are a separate corps. We propose to abolish those twenty-five naval cadets who graduate every year, thus making a reduction to that extent in the line. For every graduate appointed to the staff corps there is a corresponding reduction in the line.

The whole body of the staff will be taken out of the line in time, and the line will be reduced to that extent. We also propose in this bill another reduction of officers of the line. We propose to cut off at the top, as the bill now is, twenty-five commodores, which is a very material reduction.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a single question?

Mr. ROBESON. Certainly.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. As I understand it, there is not any real reduction. Our late apportionment bill gives us three hundred and twenty-five members of Congress, thirty-two more than we now have, and there will be thirty-two more nominations than we now have in the Navy. Hence that reduces only a possible twenty-five and increases thirty-two; so that you will have the line greater than at present, and 50 per cent. greater than before.

Mr. ROBESON. But this bill provides that every officer of the staff shall be appointed from that body which now all goes into the line. So by every appointment in the staff you reduce the line one in the future. That is too clear to talk about.

In the year of 1870 the number of engineer officers was two hundred and fifty, in 1874 two hundred and fifty-four, and it is now, including naval cadets, three hundred and seventy-two, nearly ten, quite ten for every ship we have afloat. I would do no injury to any one, but I say we must stop this increase. I am in favor of the educated engineer. I am the father of that system. I appointed the cadet-engineers. I established that school of education. I think it is better, instead of having these three hundred and seventy-two engineers for thirty-seven ships now in commission, and twenty-five more each year, to reduce and let these appointments come where they properly should come from, the representatives of the people. It is a democratic institution which takes these appointments for the staff as well as the line from every district of the country, consolidating every interest, "tarring them all with the same brush," as they say in the Navy, bringing them out of the same port-hole, putting them on the same quarter-deck and in the same engine-room, letting no one feel his superiority over the other, all children of the same beneficent action of a parent government, the ship, instead as now of being in the hands of people with diverse interest and antagonistic feeling with regard to her propulsion in the engine-room and with regard to her movement and direction, being in the hands of one harmonious, smoothly moving establishment.

It will be in the end better for the engineers themselves, better for the line officers, better for the service. If they represent the highest talent of the service, their highest talent will gravitate toward the highest duty.

Mr. KASSON. I wish the attention of the gentleman for a moment to one difficulty which I, in common with others, share in dealing with these questions. I beg him to state for my information and that of others whether this change in the initial system of the Navy is recommended by the Navy Department?

Mr. ROBESON. I will say in answer to the gentleman that it has been carefully considered by the present Secretary of the Navy, and all his heads of bureaus, both line and staff, and is advocated and recommended by them all.

Mr. KASSON. In an official communication?

Mr. ROBESON. No, in a direct communication.

Mr. KASSON. Is there anything to show it?

Mr. BOWMAN. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Does he mean to say——

Mr. KASSON. Permit me to finish.

Mr. ROBESON. I mean to say this change of policy at the academy has been agreed to by all. I have the letter of the chief of engineers on that subject. The reduction of the number of the engineer corps is not agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. The point I wish to be informed about is the authority upon which the House is asked to make an essential change in the organization of the Navy. I am not prepared to argue the question with a gentleman who has once been connected with the Navy Department, and has more knowledge than I have on the subject. There is a principle of action which I think most of the members of the House have felt it important to observe, and that is that either through the proper organization of the House committee a serious modification should be recommended or by the Navy Department itself, and I confess that my vote on many of the provisions of this bill would be guided by that fact. Now, if the gentleman says that the Navy Department has officially communicated either to the House or to his committee an indorsement of this entire proviso which the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to strike out, I should be inclined to support it on the strength of the official recommendation; or, if it has been recommended by the Naval Committee of the House. And that is why I ask the gentleman from New Jersey to state simply whether this which is proposed to be stricken out has been officially recommended by the Secretary of the Navy or any naval board, or by the Naval Committee of the House.

Mr. ROBESON. We have no official communication from the Secretary of the Navy addressed to us recommending this particular measure; but the Secretary of the Navy, and I state it as a fact, told me that it was considered by him and his chiefs of bureau, and that all of the provisions which are moved to be stricken out, not those reducing the service, were agreed to by him and by them and met their approval.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I think it is due to the committee that we should have any letter bearing upon the subject communicated to the House.

Mr. ROBESON. I will communicate it to the gentleman at any time. I happen not to have it with me at present; but the recommendation was also made directly in that way, as I have stated.

Mr. KASSON. I will only add, Mr. Chairman, the one difficulty which occurs to me in this proposition, as stated by the gentleman in the closing part of his speech, is that I fear we may lose that perfection of training and skill in the engine-room which concerns not only success in naval action, but the permanent safety of the entire armament and the ship itself. If these officers are all to be educated alike, and no special education, no technical training, as has heretofore been given, shall be allowed to the engineers, it is, it seems to me, a radical change in our policy in that regard which may greatly retard, or rather injure, the efficiency of the service.

Mr. KNOTT. I would like to be permitted to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question.

Mr. KASSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBESON. Will the gentleman from Kentucky permit a moment, and then I will yield the floor to him, simply to say that the committee thought this six years of training, both at the academy and on board ship, of the whole crew, the whole mass of cadets, (for we propose to perfect the section,) would give the cadets who go aloft to the deck some practical knowledge of the engine-room; and we propose that the Secretary of the Navy shall have authority to give to the engineers and constructors the same special training that they now have at home or abroad.

Mr. HISCOCK. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. KNOTT. I renew the pro forma amendment for the purpose of saying that I hope the motion to strike out will not be adopted.

I am in favor, Mr. Chairman, of the provision as it now stands, simply because it is, in my judgment, a step in the right direction. It is a a step toward the final abolition of a large class of officers in the naval service who are as utterly useless and unnecessary as would be a fifth wheel to a wagon. I allude to officers on the staff corps. I maintain, sir, that our cadet-midshipmen are educated in the course through which they are required to pass at the academy in all the branches necessary to fit them for the discharge of any duty required of any staff officer.

While this is true, sir, we have pay directors appointed from civil life with the rank of captain, and inspectors with the rank of commander, chief engineers with the rank of captains, and chief engineers of the rank of commanders, and so on with paymasters, assistant paymasters, assistant engineers, and passed assistant engineers, corresponding in rank with the various ranks in the line. Now, sir, when a line officer is abundantly competent and qualified by education to discharge any of the functions of a staff officer, I see no reason why, when occasion requires, he shall not be assigned to that duty instead of having a separate office instituted and maintained at the public expense for that purpose. Take, for instance, our engineers. We have, as has been intimated already by the honorable gentleman from New Jersey, ten engineers to every vessel we have in commission, the functions of which might be as easily performed by officers detailed from the line, and possibly better performed in some cases. I have nothing personally to allege against any gentleman in the engineer service of the Navy, nothing whatever; but I know from personal observation, as well as from information, that there is not one of them whose functions may not be well enough, perhaps better, performed by an officer detailed from the line.

While we have ten engineers to every steam-vessel in commission, in the French navy they have no engineers at all. They have artificers, who go down into the engine-room and do the work; and, by the way, that is practically what we are compelled to have now.

Our engineers, with their kid gloves on and handsome uniforms, do not go into the engine-room and perform the duties technically of the engineer. That is done by artificers; and I doubt very much if there is one of them in the whole Navy who ever entered the manhole of a boiler in his life. I say, therefore, that there is little need for this class of officers, since the work is done by the same class of persons who are employed in the French navy for that purpose. With one hundred and seventeen steam-vessels in that navy they have only seventy-eight machinists; and in the English navy they have only three engineers to the vessel in commission, and they are, as I am informed, seriously entertaining the proposition of abolishing them and employing artificers such as are employed in the engine-room of the merchant marine of that great nation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MILLER took the floor and yielded to Mr. SHALLENBERGER.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, the distinctive feature of this engineer school at Annapolis, which I am sorry to see broken up by this bill, is free competition for admission. This bill proposes to allow the Secretary of the Navy to appoint one cadet from each Congressional district; that cadet to be nominated by the member of Congress from the district. There is therefore an exclusive privilege belonging to only one person in the entire Congressional district every six years.

Now, I say this. The highest talent in mechanics in applied mathematics, in physics, is demanded by the progress of the age for the American Navy.

When we send to sea an iron-clad, when we put in that vessel machinery worth $600,000 or $1,000,000, when we place on her a crew and full corps of officers, treasures of life and property, I say we want the best mechanical talent of the country to be educated in special course for duty in the engine-room, abundantly competent to take hold of such machinery when out of repair and put it in order; abundantly competent, not alone by education, but by practical tests at sea, to design machinery and construct war-ships. It is not as the gentleman from Kentucky has said. On every ship at sea the assistant engineers and the passed assistant engineers do stand watch in the engine-room.

In the present era of steam-vessels the safety, the efficiency, the standing of the Navy largely depend on the engineer corps. But it has few attractions for the average cadet, who prefers the line. Young men everywhere who have a taste and talent for the corps should have the chance as now to compete for it. If we depend on nominations of Congressmen, I fear but few of the best mechanics in the country will be caught, and under this bill, no matter how well fitted a young man may be or how much desire he may have to enter the engineer corps, he is absolutely shut out unless nominated by political influence; and those nominated may have a distaste for the corps.

I do say the growing importance of the engineer corps of the Navy is felt more and more every day. As we are now designing iron-clads, as we are now seeking to raise ourselves up as a nation of the first importance in our commercial marine, we need these educated young men. I favor the provision of this bill for remanding to civil life graduates when vacancies do not exist. But every such graduate goes out an educated young officer who can be called in case of exigency to re-enter the volunteer navy, and thus serve the country which has educated him. And at the same time these graduates will form nuclei all over the land for the diffusion of education in these important branches. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ATKINS. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] has failed to show the necessity for the adoption of his amendment to strike out the legislation to which it refers. As has been stated by the gentlemau from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] much better than I can state it, this part of the bill practically consolidates all these different corps in the appointment of naval cadets to fill those places, except those of chaplain and surgeon, instead of taking them from the outer world, as is now done.

The effect of this legislation, Mr. Chairman, is to reduce the number of officers by one hundred and fifty-five. It reduces ten assistant surgeons, twenty paymasters, ten passed assistant paymasters, five assistant paymasters, ten chief engineers, fifty passed assistant engineers, and fifty assistant engineers. This is a very important reduction.

Be it remembered also that this legislation provides that if there is any one of these cadets that may show himself to have peculiar fitness for the Navy, and there is no place for him, he may be allowed to resign with one year's pay. And those who do not come under that head of peculiar fitness, as a matter of course are discharged, as they ought to be.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. HISCOCK,] the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, stated this morning, if I heard him correctly, in speaking of the civil establishment of the Navy, that it was top-heavy. We have too many officers for the men in the Navy. This legislation looks to the reduction of this naval force; and it looks to the utilization of all of it that is valuable and fit for the service. It proposes to dispense with the useless material; and it ought to be dispensed with. That needs no argument. The statement of the proposition carries with it its own evidence, and it needs no argument to show that useless material should be dispensed with. We ought to provide for that as we do in this bill. The whole system is top-heavy, and we want to cure that evil.

I hope the House in looking at this legislative provision will see it is for the purpose of strengthening that arm of the service; that it is for the purpose of benefiting it, and at the same time looking to that reform in the service which this Government ought to adopt, if such reform shall prove to be effectual and worthy.

I hope, therefore, that the Committee of the Whole will not strike out this legislation, will not adopt the amendments of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SHALLENBERGER,] but will leave the bill as it is in this respect. Although the point of order has not been made against it, I have no doubt that this portion of the bill would have been sustained, for the reason that it is a reduction of expenditures, and therefore within the rule. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to strike out the last word. I trust that this side of the House at least will commend the Committee on Appropriations in the matter of reducing the number of officers in the Navy.

It has been admitted for a quarter of a century, in all the reports and in the debates of both Houses of Congress, that one great difficulty in the Navy was that it was top-heavy in the matter of having a useless number of officers. Out of the appropriation of $15,000,000 which this committee has recommended $7,000,000 is for the pay of the officers and men of the Navy. That has been the case for several years.

I hold in my hand the naval appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882. In that bill there is appropriated for the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting $825,000; for the yards and docks throughout the whole country $440,000; for the Bureau of Construction and Repair, designed to keep all our vessels afloat, $1,500,000; and for the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing, $1,200,000. Gentlemen can go through all the various appropriations in that bill, and they will find them all meager so far as it relates to the construction and repair of the Navy; but in regard to the pay of officers, enough is appropriated to supply officers sufficient for the entire British navy. We are keeping up officers sufficient to command the best navies in the world, and yet at the same time we are always admitting that of all countries in the world we have the least occasion for a navy.

Various expedients have been resorted to to correct this evil. I remember that at one time Congress provided a board, which, by examination, should reduce the number of officers of the Navy, and in that way met this difficulty. That board met, the number of officers was reduced, and then immediately, in consequence of personal appeals, Congress enacted legislation which reinstated all of them.

That is the difficulty which surrounds us here now. The officers connected with the Navy ramify all portions of the country; they bring social pressure to bear upon all of us. Unrepresented as they are, their influence is exceedingly potent in our midst.

Now, I trust that, notwithstanding all this, when the Committee on Appropriations comes in here proposing a reduction of the number of officers of the Navy to the extent of one hundred and fifty, those of us who have continually denounced this extravagance and have demanded reform will not oppose them on a mere matter of detail.

The proposition here may not be all that we want. I should like myself very much to see some amendments made. But I think that this provision containing this reduction is far better than to perpetuate the present abuse. And I trust that, as these gentlemen on the Committee on Appropriations have concluded to meet the opposition they are likely to encounter from the Navy and from social influences, the Committee of the Whole will see fit to stand by them and commend them in their patriotic purposes.

For one, I take pleasure in giving my support to it, and I trust it will be adopted by this House. And I hope that the gentlemen having charge of the matter will stand by these reforms if the issue is made by the Senate. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SHALLENBERGER.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I ask for a division on that amendment, and that the vote be first taken upon that portion of my amendment which proposes to strike out the first proviso of this paragraph, beginning in line 27 and ending in line 38; that is, the provision which proposes to abolish the present cadet-engineers.

Mr. ROBESON. You propose to leave the present corps of cadet-engineers?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I propose to leave the law as it now stands in that regard.

The first question was upon striking out of the paragraph the following:

Provided, That hereafter there shall be no appointments of cadet-midshipmen or cadet-engineers at the Naval Academy, but in lieu thereof naval cadets shall be appointed from each Congressional district and at large as now provided by law for cadet-midshipmen, and all the undergraduates at the Naval Academy shall hereafter be designated and called "naval cadets;" and from those who successfully complete the four years' course at the academy appointments shall hereafter be made as it is necessary to fill vacancies in the lower grades of the line and various staff corps of the Navy and of the Marine Corps.

The question was taken upon that branch of the amendment; and it was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the second branch of the amendment, which is to strike out the second proviso of the paragraph as amended.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will withdraw that amendment.

Mr. ROBESON. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to move to further amend the bill, in line 34, by striking out the word "four" and inserting the word "six;" and also, in line 35, by striking out the words "at the academy;" so that it will read "and from those who successfully complete the six years' course, appointment shall be made," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOWMAN. I move to amend, in line 37 of the pending paragraph, by striking out the words "and various staff;" so that it will read:

And from those who successfully complete the six years' course appointments shall hereafter be made as it is necessary to fill vacancies in the lower grades of the line corps of the Navy and of the Marine Corps.

I appeal to members for their attention, because I cannot believe that this amendment if understood will be rejected. It has been said that every boy is a possible President. Every shipwright's apprentice working to-day with his ax and saw, every shipwright working in the yard, is a possible naval constructor, looking forward in his ambition to possibly wearing the shoulder-straps. Our present constructors were apprentices and learned their trades thoroughly with ax and saw in hand. The constructors of England and France were dock-yard mechanics, dock-yard apprentices, learning their trades thoroughly.

Here is a body of expert shipwrights in our yards, to whom this career and ambition is now open by the possibility of obtaining staff offices in the Navy. All our constructors and assistant constructors were practical mechanics.

Yet it is proposed by this bill to tell these men, many of them ingenious and all of them educated in their calling, that they shall never do anything but handle the ax and the saw, and that however perfect they may become they will hereafter find that promotion in the line of the Navy is open to no civilian without the stamp of the Naval Academy upon them.

We propose to say, "If you are a young man who has had four years' instruction at the Naval Academy, who has been educated at the expense of the Government, you may thrust aside these shipwrights of twenty, thirty, or forty years' experience in practical work." Under the provision of this bill, the greatest shipwright in England or in this country could not come here to-day and be a constructor unless he went into the Academy; he could not compete for a position of this kind with any boy just out of the Academy who never has had any practical experience.

I do not believe in the apparent tendency of the times to say that a man shall not do the work he is well calculated to do because he has not attained a certain standard of education. You might just as well and just as honestly say that no man shall be a master carpenter, however skilled he may be, or a master mason, however well qualified, or a master architect, however distinguished his ability, unless he has a diploma of graduation from the Naval Academy. Do you believe in experts or do you believe in scholars? Do you believe in practical experts, who have handled the ax, who have learned their trade practically by hard work, or do you believe that scholars who have gone through the Naval Academy shall push such men aside? Is it not better to have open competition throughout the country, to pick out from the whole field the best and most distinguished practical men who will do most credit to the Navy, rather than to say that only graduates shall take these positions which heretofore have been open to civilians? Every one of these offices to which so much credit has attached, the duties of which have been performed so successfully, is to-day filled by a civilian who learned his trade by hard work as an apprentice and learned it practically.

Mr. Chairman, it is not a democratic measure to have this educated aristocracy extend their lines and drive out from the service the skilled mechanics of the country. All that these ask is that if they show excellence and superiority in their business, if they demonstrate that they are the best men, they may come into competition with cadets and may be allowed to obtain these positions if they are qualified for them. Any other principle is undemocratic and wrong. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HISCOCK. As I understand the gentleman's proposition, it is that the staff shall be filled from civil life——

Mr. BOWMAN. Just as before, in all the history of the country.

Mr. HISCOCK. That is your proposition—that the staff shall be filled from civil life.

Mr. BOWMAN. That the staff positions shall be open to competition, just as they have been from the foundation of the Government; that these positions, which are generally mechanical or, as in the case of the paymasters, clerical, shall be open to civilians if they are as competent as graduates.

Mr. ATKINS. Are not appointments to the Naval Academy now open to persons in civil life?

Mr. BOWMAN. No, sir.

Mr. ATKINS. Then where do the appointees come from?

Mr. BOWMAN. If the gentleman will allow me to answer, I will say that these appointments, though made from civil life, are made upon the nominations of Congressmen, and are thus confined to a few hundred; they are not open to the great body of mechanics or men in the country; there is no open competition from civil life.

Mr. ATKINS. The Congressman is elected by his constituency.

Mr. BOWMAN. One person out of 140,000 receives an appointment to the Naval Academy.

Mr. HISCOCK. I yielded to the gentleman from Massachusetts to answer my question. If his answer is now complete, I am entirely satisfied. I wish to say that this amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts would substantially defeat all that the committee has aimed at. I am satisfied that upon this point as upon others we are perhaps to meet with a sharp contest, because it is a question of patronage for somebody; the efficiency of the service is not in view at all; it is simply the perquisites of party, nothing more or less, that are sought to be preserved by this amendment. I certainly hope it will be defeated.

Mr. BOWMAN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I would not say anything further if the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] had not made a personal charge. He said, as I understood, that everything done here by way of amendment was intended to be for political patronage.

Mr. HISCOCK. I said that the purpose of this amendment is political patronage; that is the object to be gained by it.

Mr. BOWMAN. If the gentleman knew how constructors are appointed he would not make that statement. The gentleman does not know what he is talking about. Naval constructors are appointed upon examination of their skill. I have not heard of any political patronage being used to get constructors or assistant constructors appointed, and it would not amount to much if there was any such patronage. Is it acting for political patronage to oppose a provision which is in the interest of an educated, a privileged class? Is it working for political patronage to appear here for the people and urge that the best mechanics of this country should be allowed to take part in a competitive examination for these offices? It is proposed by this bill to say that these positions shall not be open to the mechanics of the country but only to graduates from a certain academy, who shall take the positions, however unfit they may be for them, however little experience they may have had, and if they have never handled an ax, for it is not supposed—is it?—that they are going into the dock-yard to handle the ax and the saw, and get practically acquainted with the work.

Is it supposed they are going into the ship-yards? Certainly not. Therefore I am willing, if there is any opprobrium in it, to stand here the advocate of the right to free competition and the right of mechanics, even if not educated in a naval academy, even if not scholars, even if not posted in Greek and Latin and French and grammar and the higher mathematics, to come in here and be master shipwrights; for to be a constructor in the Navy Department is to be an expert shipwright, if the appointments are made as they ought to be.

Mr. ROBESON. The future navy is to be of iron and steel, and not to be constructed by the axes of shipwrights, but upon lines and displacements.

Mr. BOWMAN. My remarks apply to machinists just as they apply to shipwrights.

The question recurred on Mr. BOWMAN'S amendment.

The committee divided; and there were ayes 57, noes not counted.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED. I ask whether there is any serious objection to omitting naval constructors. If not, I will submit an amendment to "except naval constructors."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send his amendment to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. REED. It is to insert after the the word "corps" in line 37 the words "except naval constructors."

Mr. ROBESON. As the future of the navy is to be iron and steel, and special training and education are required in both classes of officers——

Mr. REED. Perhaps it is not entirely certain that will be the result. If we are going to have naval constructors we ought to have practical men, and the Naval Academy can never be brought into such a condition that the whole body of naval constructors can be educated there.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will make a suggestion to the gentleman from Maine to withhold his amendment, as it seems to be confined to naval constructors, till some future time, when we can return to this paragraph.

Mr. REED. I have no objection. I only make the suggestion in the best interest of the service.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the appointment of cadets to positions in the line or in the staff corps shall not create vacancies for appointments to the Naval Academy until two years after the completion of the four years' academic course, as now provided for cadet-midshipmen.

Mr. ROBESON. I am directed by the committee to offer the following amendment. Strike out the paragraph just read and in lieu thereof insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe a special course of study and training at home or abroad for any naval cadet assigned to a staff corps.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the active list of the engineer corps of the Navy shall hereafter consist of ten chief engineers, with the relative rank of captain; fifteen chief engineers, with the relative rank of commander; thirty-five chief engineers with the relative rank of lieutenant-commander or lieutenant, and one hundred assistant and passed assistant engineers with the relative rank for each as now fixed by law; and after the number of officers in the said grades shall be reduced as above provided, the number in each grade shall not exceed the reduced number which is fixed by the provisions of this act for the several grades.

Mr. ROBESON. I move the following amendment from the committee:

On page 4, line 79, strike out "thirty-five" and in lieu thereof insert "forty-five."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I move to strike out the clause referring to engineers. I do so in the nature of a pro forma amendment for the purpose of making the remark that in making this large reduction in this corps, in my judgment, in the future the action of the House taken at the present time will be reversed.

This reduction, if it were equalized in every other corps in the Navy, might be just and proper.

If, again, this House and the country knew what was to be the character of the future Navy of the country it might act advisedly, but from what has happened and from what has been said on this floor it must be known that the future navy of America is to be a steam navy; that we are to resort to steam-vessels almost entirely; that we are to resort to rams and torpedoes; that the duties imposed on engineer officers are to be increased rather than decreased, are to be multiplied rather than diminished. You have put the pruning-knife into this corps very largely. You have not done so correspondingly in the other corps of the Navy. When gentlemen come practically to reflect on this they will see the personnel of the Navy is its most material and necessary branch. I believe for one, sir——

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Certainly.

Mr. HISCOCK. What does the gentleman understand to be the practical duties of the members of the engineer corps?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. If the gentleman will possess himself for a moment I will answer him. I was going to say this corps ought to be reorganized. If I individually had the power I would diminish the number of engineer officers and increase the class of men known as machinists. I would make the engineer corps a corps of skill and talent. I would make them what they are now, practically, supervising officers or overseers of the work of the machinists of the Navy. But, sir, without attempting that kind of reform, or that kind of reorganization, you come in ruthlessly and cut down a number of officers without regard to what may be the demand of the Navy and the country in the future.

I have made, sir, these remarks and my proposition to amend, only for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to this matter, and giving notice that in my judgment the future action of Congress will be to reverse what is done here to-day in this respect.

I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. My colleague will observe that we do not reduce the number of chief engineers at all. They remain just as they are.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of the retired list, namely: For forty-two rear-admirals, twenty commodores, twelve captains, ten commanders, fifteen lieutenant-commanders, eight lieutenants, eleven masters, five ensigns, two midshipmen, twenty-two medical directors, two medical inspectors, two surgeons, five passed assistant surgeons, seven assistant surgeons, nine pay directors, two pay inspectors, three paymasters, two passed assistant paymasters, one assistant paymaster, nine chief engineers, nineteen passed assistant engineers, twenty-five assistant engineers, nine chaplains, seven professors of mathematics, three naval constructors, ten boatswains, five gunners, thirteen carpenters, and ten sailmakers; in all $697,925: Provided, That hereafter all promotions to the grade of rear-admiral on the active list shall be made by selection from the grades of commodore and captain, and no more promotions to the grade of commodore shall be made: Provided, however, That no commodore now in the service shall be reduced in rank or deprived of his commission by reason of this act: And provided further, That when a vacancy in the grade of rear-admiral shall occur in time of peace, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to convene a board of three officers not below the grade of rear-admiral, who shall select the names of five officers not below the grade of captain, one of whom shall be nominated by the President to fill said vacancy: And provided further, That any commodore over whom a junior in rank is thus promoted may, upon his own application, be placed upon the retired list with the rank and pay of rear-admiral; and the provisions of the laws retiring other naval officers shall apply in all respects to the Admiral and Vice-Admiral of the Navy. And sections 1446 and 1461 of the Revised Statutes of the United States are hereby repealed, except that such officers as have upon the recommendation of the President of the United States received by name a vote of thanks of Congress shall receive the full pay of their grade until they shall have been fifty-five years in the service of the United States.

Mr. MORSE and Mr. ATKINS addressed the Chair.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to reserve the point of order upon one of the provisions of this section.

Mr. ATKINS. I raise the point of order upon that portion of the paragraph contained between lines 124 and 127, beginning with the words "and provided further" and ending with "rear-admiral."

Mr. CALKINS. Will the gentleman from Tennessee allow me to suggest that he reserve the point of order while I move to strike out the whole paragraph?

Mr. MORSE. That is a motion that I had intended to make.

Mr. ATKINS. I would prefer not, for the reason, I will state to the gentleman from Indiana, that with the exception of the words referred to by myself, and upon which I have made the point of order, I prefer that the remainder of the paragraph should not be stricken out. For that reason I would rather not yield for the motion.

Mr. CALKINS. If the gentleman will allow me, if the whole paragraph goes out on the motion to strike out, then of course the words he objects to as being subject to the point of order will go out also.

Mr. ATKINS. But I do not want the whole paragraph to go out.

Mr. CALKINS. If the gentleman will bear with me a moment, it perhaps will save time if he will allow me to make this motion, because if the point of order is made now and discussed, and subsequently a motion is made to strike out the whole paragraph, which prevails, of course the time taken in the discussion of the point of order will be that much time lost.

Mr. ATKINS. I will state the point of order and let it be determined before the other motion.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to reserve the further point of order on that portion of the paragraph after the words "rear-admiral," in line 127——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can entertain only one point of order at this time. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to make the point of order upon the proviso beginning with line 118——

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ATKINS. I have made a point of order on a portion of this paragraph, and believe the Chair has recognized me to enforce it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee has been recognized.

Mr. ATKINS. Now, the gentleman from Georgia is making another point of order, and I am afraid unless one or the other is decided we may get into confusion.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am only calling attention to this portion of the paragraph which I believe is subject to the point of order, but do not desire now to press it upon the attention of the committee.

Mr. ATKINS. The language I have referred to, Mr. Chairman, is new legislation and not in the interest of economy, and therefore obnoxious to the rule.

Mr. CALKINS. Will the gentleman state the language to which he objects?

Mr. ATKINS. I will read it, beginning with line 124:

And provided further, That any commodore over whom a junior in rank is thus promoted may, upon his own application, be placed upon the retired list with the rank and pay of rear-admiral.

Now the pay of a commodore at sea is $5,000 per annum, on shore duty $4,000, and on leave or waiting orders $3,000 per annum; while the pay of a rear-admiral is $6,000 at sea, $5,000 on shore duty, &c., while three-fourths of these amounts is retired pay.

Now, if a commodore shall be retired upon a rear-admiral's pay, he would be retired at a sum equal to his own pay while on the active list; and therefore there would be no economy whatever in the retirement of such an officer. Let the commodore retire upon the commodore's pay. None of these officers are compelled by this bill to be retired, but they may be retired. However, the bill does not enforce it; but if they are to be retired on the pay of a rear-admiral they will be retired on the same pay as they are entitled to under the law while on active duty. The bill as it stands would increase the expenditures of the Government some $12,000 per annum. I maintain, therefore, that the portion I have read is subject to the point of order.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the motion to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to hear discussion upon the point of order before entertaining the proposition to amend.

Mr. CALKINS. There is another provision of the bill which is also obnoxious to the point of order, and which has been raised by the gentleman from Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. There cannot be two points of order pending at the same time. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New Jersey on the point of order.

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Chairman, this whole provision is a provision to clear from the service the twenty-five commodores whose pay on shore duty is $5,000 per annum, making a reduction in the number of officers and a reduction in the amount of salary when executed of $125,000 a year.

Mr. ATKINS. Will my colleague on the committee allow me to suggest that that is when they are all retired?

Mr. ROBESON. Undoubtedly. The whole scope of the provision looks to that; and that is what the new legislation is intended for. Now, as a qualification of that new legislation, and in the order of its processes, we make a provision, to make it just, which stops that reduction perhaps $12,000 when it is done; but that is all. This proviso is only a qualification of the other, and the whole provision is a provision which looks to economy and retrenchment in the public service. It will not do to say when you have a provision for retrenchment that every word in it shall look to retrenchment, that everything in the provision must tend toward it. Suppose we should say that we shall strike down a man's salary $5,000, less $500; that looks to $4,500 reduction. Is the whole provision because of the proviso "less $500" obnoxious to the point of order, while the whole provision and the very aim of it is to accomplish the purpose of retrenchment? Every proposition of this kind must be made up of parts. All advance in the direction of economy must be by separate steps. When you make them part of the whole movement, one step may be behind the other; but if the whole proposition is in the line of economy it is not open to objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the three provisos should be construed together as each one relates to the other. The first proviso is that hereafter promotions to the grade of rear-admiral shall be made by selection from the grades of commodore and captain, and that no more promotions to the grade of commodore shall be made. If the Chair is rightly informed the promotion necessarily involves an increase of pay; and while the Chair has not had time to give the point as much of his attention as he should have liked to do the Chair is of the opinion the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. BLOUNT. I raise the question of order on the proviso beginning with line 118, which is as follows:

And provided further, That when a vacancy in the grade of rear-admiral shall occur in time of peace it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to convene a board of three officers not below the grade of rear-admiral, who shall select the names of five officers not below the grade of captain, one of whom shall be nominated by the President to fill said vacancy.

It cannot be said this provision is any part of this scheme looking toward retrenchment. The simple idea of this provision is as to the mode of promotion. Under the law as it now stands an officer would go up by seniority. This proviso directs a board shall be convened of three officers, who shall select the names of five officers to be recommended to the President, one of whom he shall nominate to fill the vacancy. With this provision out, the remainder of the paragraph would not be at all interfered with. This stands entirely by itself. It is new legislation, and it does not retrench at all.

I do not propose now to discuss this on its merits. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] will hardly allege that this proviso is not a change of existing law, or that it contributes to this part of the bill anything in the nature of retrenchment.

Mr. HISCOCK. The answer of the gentleman from New Jersey to the point of order made by the gentleman from Tennessee is a perfect answer here to the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia. If you read the whole paragraph together it is clear what it seeks to accomplish and what it will accomplish. It gets rid of one grade of officers in the Navy and in the end terminates the expense of that grade in the Navy. In the end no appropriation will be necessary to be made for the pay of that grade. This is one of the provisions by which that result is worked out. You cannot single out one of those provisions and strike it down; they are interwoven; they are together a system which produces a certain result, and that result, as I have stated, is in the line of retrenchment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am surprised at the argument of the gentleman from New York, which is made up of assertions directly in contradiction of what appears in this paragraph. This proviso has nothing to do with abolishing the office of commodore. It is a naked provision, standing by itself, and is no part of the system the gentleman has referred to. It simply provides when a vacancy in the grade of rear-admiral shall occur in time of peace it shall be filled by the intervention of a board instead of by seniority. It does not make any part of this system. It does not touch it. Every other provision would operate completely without it.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is absolutely necessary to have this board in order to get rid of that intermediate grade.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will read it again:

And provided further—

If it were in a separate paragraph it would have just the same effect.

And provided further, That when a vacancy in the grade of rear-admiral shall occur in time of peace, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to convene a board of three officers not below the grade of rear-admiral, who shall select the names of five officers not below the grade of captain, one of whom shall be nominated by the President to fill said vacancy.

Is that a part of any system to abolish the office of commodore? Would not the provision on that subject operate without it? Does not this stand nakedly and alone, and would this bill be touched at all as regards this part of it, if this stood in a separate paragraph?

I can well understand the disposition of the gentleman from New Jersey to carry successfully every provision of this bill through; but I cannot understand how he should insist the point of order does not lie against this proviso.

Mr. ROBESON. The proviso against which my friend from Georgia has made his point of order is not only open to the same construction as that to which the point of order was made by the gentleman from Tennessee, but it seems to me the case is still stronger for this proviso on the point of order. It is a part of the provision which permits the appointment of a captain to be rear-admiral without any promotion to the corps of commodores, whereas if it were not for that provision there would be a new officer put into the line of commodore; it would make a new commodore. This decreases expenditure by leaving out of that movement one commodore for every promotion to rear-admiral, provided a captain is appointed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that if the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] were made against this provision standing by itself, and not in connection with the other provisos in this paragraph, it might be a sound one. But from line 112 to line 129 inclusive, in the judgment of the Chair, each provision relates to the others, and one cannot be stricken out without affecting the others. These provisions, in the judgment of the Chair, by intention upon their face retrench expenditures, and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to make a point of order against that portion of the paragraph after the word "rear-admiral" in line 127, believing that the Chair is in error in regarding, if he does, what follows that word as part of the scheme of retrenchment contained in this paragraph.

I call the attention of the Chair to this point: all of the paragraph after the word "rear-admiral," in line 127, relates exclusively to the two grades of Admiral and Vice-Admiral. No officer is affected by the remainder of this paragraph except the Admiral and Vice-Admiral. Those officers have no successors, their offices terminating with the lives of the present incumbents, and no officer succeeding them in those offices.

If the Chair will examine lines 134, 135, and 136 of this paragraph he will find that they propose a change of law so as to retire the Admiral and Vice-Admiral, but that change does not effect a retrenchment of expenditures. That portion of the paragraph provides that an officer who has "received by name a vote of thanks of Congress" shall receive the full pay of his grade until he shall have been fifty-five years in the service of the United States.

My point of order is that all of the paragraph after the word "rear-admiral," in line 127, affects only the two officers I have mentioned, the Admiral and Vice-Admiral, and is a change in existing law without effecting any retrenchment of expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] send up the law to which he refers?

Mr. KASSON. I send up the Revised Statutes, and call the attention of the Chair to sections 1446 and 1461.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order made by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] that the portion of the paragraph referred to by him changes existing law and that it does not retrench expenditures, is well taken, and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

The committee rose informally, and Mr. BRIGGS took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 3831) to create a district for the inspection of hulls and boilers of steam-vessels.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a joint resolution of the following title:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 248) to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. CALKINS. I move to strike out of the pending paragraph the provisos contained in lines 112 and 124 inclusive.

The portion proposed to be struck out is as follows:

Provided, That hereafter all promotions to the grade of rear-admiral on the active list shall be made by selection from the grades of commodore and captain, and no more promotions to the grade of commodore shall be made: Provided, however, That no commodore now in the service shall be reduced in rank or deprived of his commission by reason of this act: And provided further, That when a vacancy in the grade of rear-admiral shall occur in time of peace it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to convene a board of three officers not below the grade of rear-admiral, who shall select the names of five officers not below the grade of captain, one of whom shall be nominated by the President to fill said vacancy.

Mr. CALKINS. There are two points to which I desire to call the attention of the committee, and which are contained in that portion of the paragraph which I have moved to strike out. The rank of commodore in the Navy corresponds with the rank of brigadier-general in the Army. Now, if you allow the provisions of this bill to remain as they now are, you will in time have a navy without any intermediate rank between that of captain and that of rear-admiral.

By the law as it now stands, (the law of 1866,) provision is made for twenty-five commodores in the Navy, to thereafter remain upon the active list, corresponding in rank, as I have said, with brigadier-generals in the Army. There would be just as much sense and propriety in striking down the rank of brigadier-general in the Army as there is in striking down the rank of commodore in the Navy.

When this rank was created the doors were opened for the promotion of certain officers who had earned their positions in the Navy by service in the awful conflict of war. Many of them went into the Navy because, under the law as they saw it, they could tell precisely at what time they might attain the rank of commodore if the law remained substantially unchanged, and therefore be released from some of the hardships of actual service on water, and be enabled to remain the balance of their lives holding this honorable rank of commodore of the Navy. This was one of the inducements which was held out by Congress to men to enlist and become permanently a part of our Navy. To say to these men now after years of service, "We will sweep your rank from under you; we will stop your promotion, and allow you to remain the rest of your lives with the rank of captain which you now have," is simply practicing false pretenses upon them.

It is not the part of wise or honorable legislation in my judgment, after we have held out this inducement to these men, to deny them now, when they are falling into the "sere and yellow leaf," the promotion we have promised them.

More than that, we said to the brightest boys who graduated from our naval schools, "if you will stay in the Navy, the office of commodore awaits you after you have attained a certain age." And now, after they have given the best part of their lives to this service, to deny them this promotion is ingratitude. This committee ought not to hesitate one moment to strike out such a provision. As to the saving, it amounts to only $7,000 a year—a mere bagatelle, a pittance; no man can ground his vote upon that.

Mr. Chairman, if I could reach the ear and the heart of this committee, no member here would vote to retain this provision in the bill; but in the five minutes allowed me I must simply make an appeal to the younger men of the House and the country, and say to them, "Do not let the younger men of the Navy be sacrificed; give them this rank." We all know how the advance of one grade in the Army or Navy is cherished by these officers. I have in my hand letters of Lord Nelson, one of the grandest sailors, if not the grandest, that ever commanded a ship on the ocean. In one of these letters he says that the smallest advancement in rank is worth to him as much as one of his hardest-earned victories is to his country.

Mr. Chairman, I protest against this provision as an act of injustice and ingratitude to these young officers whom we have induced to enter our Navy.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio, obtained the floor, and yielded to Mr. CALKINS.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Chairman, I hope to see in my life-time the American Navy standing as it did at the close of the war, at the head of all the navies of the world. We have the material. We have the best sailors. We have the best educated men from whom to select its officers. We are advanced as far in all the arts, sciences, and appliances necessary to build up a navy as any nation of the world. I am in favor of holding out to these men every inducement to make the American Navy what it will be, if we give it half a chance, the best that floats on the sea.

This bill also provides for a board of examination. Mr. Chairman, I am not in favor of allowing the Army or the Navy to entangle itself in any way with the politics of the country. I ask attention to the provision of this bill by which a board is to be appointed to select five captains or commodores for promotion to the rank of admiral when vacancies occur, from whom the President is to make a selection of one. I would rather trust this power with one man, as at present, than allow so many to make these recommendations for promotion. The men, with whom this board have not been intimately associated, who have not served under them, although they may stand away up on the list of captains, will naturally be overlooked in recommendations for promotion, because the officers of the board have not had such personal knowledge of their services as they may have had of those in the junior ranks, with whom they have been associated. In this way the board is liable all the time to do injustice.

The men composing this board will of course be subject to the same influences as other men. It may be that an officer desiring promotion is intermarried with the family of some member of the board or connected with him by the ties of kinship. We can imagine how strong would be the motive in such a case to send to the President for appointment the name of this relative. I submit that this provision should be stricken from the bill, and the power of promotion remain where it is at present—with the Secretary of the Navy and the President.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Is there not some constitutional objection to this clause providing that a board shall select five officers and that the President must nominate for promotion one of the five?

Mr. CALKINS. Yes, sir; there is a constitutional objection to it, which I have not time to advert to.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. The bill proposes to confine the President in his selection to the five men named by this board, whereas apart from this provision he could select from the whole field.

Mr. BRIGGS. There is nothing in that constitutional objection. If it were sound, Congress would have no right to provide that the President, in making promotions, shall select from the rank next below that in which the appointment is to be made.

Mr. McLANE. I should like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, while he is on that point, whether it is not manifestly an unconstitutional provision? What right has this Congress to control the President of the United States in nominating a rear-admiral?

Mr. CALKINS. From any class of men.

Mr. McLANE. The power is in the President to nominate.

Mr. ROBESON. If the gentleman will admit that, and say the law is that now, and take that position, I have no objection; but the law is not so now.

Mr. CALKINS. All this will be obviated if gentlemen will simply vote this provision out of the bill and let the bill stand with this eliminated, as I hope they will do.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ROBESON. I move to strike out the last word.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I know no person with whom I would rather agree than my friend who has just taken his seat. I recognize the qualities of his heart as well as those of his head, and I think if he understood this question better as to the matter of information he would change his opinion.

As the law now stands the President has no volition at all, constitutional or unconstitutional. As the law now stands, and has been followed for the last fifty years, he has no volition.

In a time of peace admirals are appointed as men grow old, only the survival of the stupidest on the roll instead of the promotion of the best. [Laughter and applause.] That is true. The man with brains and energy, the man of character and activity, wears out and frets out before he has a chance to reach the rewards of his profession. But the man who takes neither interest in his country nor in his service, but who vegetates along from year to year on the pay his country gives him, survives, and, by reason of lapse of time, when he gets too old to do duty he is made a rear-admiral to command the fleets of the country. That is just what happens now, with a few highly honorable exceptions. The brains, the capacity, the nerve, the advancement, the talent, the progression of the Navy has no chance.

Now, then, who does it interfere with? We have cut down the staff officers of this Navy about one hundred and forty-five by this bill. We strike at the line with even-handed justice. Whom do we strike? We strike the twenty-five commodores, men who have no parallel in any naval service in the world.

No naval system of any European country has a commodore. He is too big for a ship and too small for a squadron. [Laughter and applause.] He can command nothing but a navy-yard, or be the chief of a bureau. We never had him in the service before the war. Post-captain was the highest legal grade in the service. Men were called commodores by courtesy when they had commanded squadrons. All our naval battles were fought and carried by captains.

When we came to reorganize the Army and Navy, in order that there might be a regulation of even precedence, in order that there might be some officer to correspond with brigadier-general in the Army, a new grade was created, one-half horse and one-half alligator, [great laughter,] good for nothing in any organization of the service in the world.

There are many honorable men among them. They could not help getting there. Anno Domini was too much for them. [Laughter.] They were growing old and were promoted in the regular course of succession from captains to commodores.

We propose this: that the admirals of the Navy who are to command our fleets in time of war, who are to do the directing and fighting, shall be taken by selection, not by this regular course of degradation, but shall be taken by selection from the whole list of captains.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ROBESON. I would like to conclude these remarks.

Mr. CALKINS. I will withdraw the amendment and you can renew it.

Mr. ROBESON. I renew it. Now, then, Mr. Chairman, who is injured by this? Not the young men of the Navy. The only people who are possibly injured are a few captains who stand near the top of the list, and they are injured, how? Because we have provided that there shall be no more promotions to the rank of commodores and it shall die out——

Mr. CALKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROBESON. Certainly.

Mr. CALKINS. How can you interfere with the top of the list without injuring it all the way down?

Mr. ROBESON. I will show you. Twenty-five or thirty in the rank of captain will remain captains for the next ten or fifteen years anyhow. Five or six years will enable us to get clear, under this process, of this grade of commodore without doing any injury to any individual man, and the men that are now in the body of the captaincy, or who are in the body of the commanderships, will then be just twenty-five numbers nearer the head of the list.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey whether every grade is not affected just as well as the captains and commanders?

Mr. ROBESON. I will state to the gentleman——

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope the gentleman from New Jersey will yield, so that I may make a motion that the committee now rise, as it is nearly five o'clock, when by an order of the House a recess is to be taken.

Mr. ROBESON. I will yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to offer some amendments to be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. HISCOCK. Not to be offered as pending amendments?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. No, sir; simply offered for information, to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Then I offer the following amendments, to be printed in the RECORD:

Provided, (1.) That from and after the passage of this act all matters pertaining to the design, construction, equipment, armament, manning, and repair of all vessels now belonging to the Navy, or that may hereafter be built, rebuilt, or purchased for the Naval service, shall be submitted by the chiefs of bureaus of the Navy Department to the Secretary of the Navy, who shall submit them to an advisory board for examination and report as hereinafter provided.

This advisory board shall be composed of six commissioned officers of the active list of the Navy, who shall be selected as follows: one from either of the grades of rear-admiral or commodore; one from the grade of captain; one from either of the grades of commander or lieutenant-commander; one from the grade of lieutenant; one from the grade of chief engineer, with the relative rank of captain, commander, or lieutenant-commander; and one from the grade of naval constructor, with the relative rank of captain, commander, or lieutenant-commander.

The members of this advisory board shall take rank and have precedence at all times, in all places, and under all circumstances, according to the dates of their respective commissions as officers of the Navy.

The first term of service of the first senior member of this advisory board shall be one year; the first term of service of the first member second in rank shall be one year and six months; the first term of service of the first member third in rank shall be two years; the first term of service of the first member fourth in rank shall be two years and six months; the first term of service of the first member fifth in rank shall be three years; the first term of service of the first junior member shall be four years.

The second term of service and all subsequent terms of service of all other members shall be three years.

The five senior members of the advisory board shall not be eligible for two or more consecutive terms of service.

The junior member of the advisory board shall not be eligible for more than two consecutive terms of service.

The members of this advisory board shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Officers who are for the time being chiefs of bureaus of the Navy Department shall not be eligible for appointment as members of this advisory board.

Vacancies in the membership of this advisory board shall be filled for the unexpired term only. Promotion to a higher grade of any member shall not create a vacancy, but retirement from active service from any cause whatever of any member shall create a vacancy.

Members of the advisory board shall not be removed for any cause whatever without trial by court-martial, and only by sentence thereof in due form according to law.

Any member of the advisory board who may, from any cause whatsoever, be absent from the meetings of the board for six consecutive weeks shall by virtue of such absence be deemed no longer a member of the board, and shall not be eligible for reappointment.

A new member shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for the unexpired term of such member.

It shall be unlawful for the President, the Secretary of the Navy, or any one in authority to give any order to any member of the advisory board, during the term of office of such member, that would prevent his attending the meetings, participating with the fullest freedom in the discussions and proceedings, and recording his vote on all questions that may come before the advisory board.

The discussions, proceedings, votes, and conclusions of this advisory board shall be recorded exactly as they occur, and at the time, by a sworn stenographer under the immediate supervision of the recorder of the advisory board, who shall be held responsible for the accuracy of the report.

The proceedings of the advisory board shall be conducted with open doors, in an orderly manner, and according to rules to be established by the board.

Four members shall be a quorum; and a vote of four members shall be requisite to adopt, alter, or amend any rule.

The record of the proceedings shall be preserved in the archives of the Navy Department and shall be accessible to all citizens of the United States who may desire to examine them.

The Secretary of the Navy shall be the president ex-officio of this advisory board.

The junior member shall be the recorder.

The Secretary of the Navy may, at his discretion, take part in person in the deliberations, proceedings, and discussions of the advisory board, and he may at his discretion record his vote for or against any measure.

In the absence of the Secretary of the Navy the senior member present of the advisory board shall preside.

Whenever there may be a tie vote in the advisory board the presiding officer shall notify the Secretary of the Navy who shall then vote on the pending question and decide it.

The advisory board shall proceed immediately to the consideration of all matters submitted to it by the Secretary of the Navy, and in the order in which they are submitted, unless the Secretary of the Navy shall direct in writing that any particular measure or measures shall have precedence.

The meetings and sittings of the advisory board shall be continuous daily, except Sunday, from 10 a. m. until 3 p. m. pending the consideration of any measure submitted to it that shall have been accompanied by a notification that its decision on such measure or measures is required with all possible dispatch consistent with a thorough examination of the questions involved.

The advisory board shall have power by a vote of the majority to summon and examine under oath, in accordance with the rules prescribed for naval boards, any officer, enlisted or appointed man of the Navy not on duty in a commissioned vessel on a foreign station, any civil employé of the Navy or any contractor engaged in work for the Navy, but such examination shall be promptly proceeded with, and shall not extend beyond the matter or matters immediately under consideration.

In the event of two-thirds of the advisory board desiring to summon any officer on duty or on a vessel in commission in a foreign station, the Secretary of the Navy shall issue the requisite order to such officer unless the public interest would materially suffer thereby, in which case a full statement of his reasons for declining to issue the order shall be communicated to the advisory board and spread on the record of its proceedings.

No vessel shall be purchased for the Navy until this advisory board has made a thorough examination into her condition and a practical test of her qualities and submitted a report, signed by the majority, that she is adapted to the service required of her in the Navy, and that her value is equal to the price agreed upon by the Secretary of the Navy and the owner.

No vessel shall be built or rebuilt for the Navy until detailed designs specifications, computations, and estimates for the hull, motive power, armament, and equipment shall have been carefully examined in every particular and approved of in writing by a majority of this advisory board.

Detailed plans, specifications, and estimates for repairs to all vessels of the Navy involving an expenditure of $10,000, or more, shall be submitted to the advisory board for examination and approval before they shall be executed.

The advisory board may, at the discretion of the majority, before rejection, return to the Secretary all or any part of the designs, specifications, computations, and estimates for building, rebuilding, repairing, arming, equipping, and manning any vessel of the Navy, with their objections in writing specifically set forth, in order to afford the bureau having cognizance of the parts objected to by the advisory board an opportunity to modify or alter the designs, specifications, computations, and estimates.

The decision of the advisory board shall be final on all matters pertaining to the construction, repair, equipment, armament, and manning of all vessels that now belong to the Navy, and all vessels that hereafter may be built, rebuilt, or purchased for the naval service, except as hereinafter provided.

These decisions shall be signed by those voting therefor, and shall be communicated to the Secretary of the Navy immediately after they are arrived at.

No minority reports or protests of any kind shall be submitted.

The Secretary of the Navy shall not alter, amend, or modify any decision of the advisory board; but he shall have power to reject such decision.

Whenever he shall deem it his duty in the interests of the public service to reject such decision, he shall immediately place on file, with the proceedings of the advisory board, a written statement setting forth in detail his reasons therefor.

The Secretary of the Navy shall cause to be executed all decisions of the advisory board which he shall not reject.

The chiefs of bureaus having cognizance of all matters affected by the decisions of the advisory board shall duly execute these decisions without regard to their individual judgment, opinions, or wishes.

Any person in the naval service who shall violate any provision of this act shall be punished as a general court-martial may decide.

A penalty not exceeding $5,000 and imprisonment not to exceed two years may be inflicted on any civil officer of the Government or any contractor for the Navy who shall be found guilty of violating any part or parts of this act.

All acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. HISCOCK. I now move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAGE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6616) making appropriations for the naval service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, had come to no conclusion thereon.

VACATION OF ORDER FOR EVENING SESSION.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the previous order of the House providing for a recess from five o'clock until eight o'clock this evening be vacated for this day.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (S. No. 58) to print Dr. John L. Hayes's pamphlet upon the husbandry of the Angora goat;

A bill (S. No. 1020) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River at the town of Van Buren, Crawford County, Arkansas;

A bill (S. No. 1810) to authorize the Rock Island and Southwestern Railway Company to construct a bridge over the Mississippi River at New Boston, State of Illinois;

A bill (H. R. No. 6225) to authorize the changing of alley-ways in the city of Washington; and

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 224) accepting the offer of Dr. H. D. Cogswell, of San Francisco, California, to donate to the Government of the United States an ornamental drinking-fountain, to be erected at his cost in the city of Washington.

Mr. BELMONT, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 5664) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

Mr. WARNER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 3830) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIM, ANTONIO VACA.

Mr. PACHECO, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back the communication from the Department of the Interior respecting the private land-claim case of Antonio Vaca, with a recommendation that an appropriation be made in compliance with the request of the Secretary of the Interior; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

AMERICAN CITIZENS IMPRISONED ABROAD.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to present a petition of the Davitt Land League of Paterson, New Jersey, in regard to American citizens imprisoned in Ireland, with request that the same be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The petition is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Members of the Davitt Land League, Paterson, New Jersey, respectfully call the attention of your honorable body and the Committee on Foreign Affairs to the following facts that have been brought to their notice in the debate in the British House of Parliament on Thursday last, which is as follows:

"The House took up clause 12, which provides for the application of the alien act to aliens in Ireland.

"Baron de Worms, who on Monday had given notice that he would ask Mr. Gladstone whether the United States Government had refused to agree to the expulsion of American suspects from Ireland as a condition for their release, asked if there were any Americans still confined there.

"Sir Charles Dilke, in reply, said he 'believed there were still some American citizens imprisoned in Ireland.'"

We desire to know if this is true. When England has released her own subjects, is it solely because of their American citizenship she continues to keep those Americans in prison? How long shall these things be? Hoping for a favorable report, we respectfully submit the above for your consideration.

CONDEMNED CANNON—CHICOPEE, MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6419) granting four condemned cannon to Otis Chapman Post No. 103 of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Chicopee, Massachusetts, for monumental purposes, and that the same be put upon its passage.

There was no objection.

The bill was read. It is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to deliver to Otis Chapman Post No. 103 of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Chicopee, Massachusetts, four condemned cast-iron cannon for monumental purposes.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TEMPORARY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to call up from the Speaker's table the joint resolution (H. R. No. 248) adopted this morning by the House, providing temporary appropriations for the expenditures of the Government, with the view to concurring in the Senate amendments thereto.

The SPEAKER. The Senate amendments will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, where it occurs in the joint resolution, the words "fifteen days" and insert in lieu thereof "twenty days;" so that it will read "for a period of twenty days from and after that date." Also strike out the word "fifteen," where it occurs the second time in the joint resolution, so that it will read as "twenty days' time bears to the whole of said fiscal year."

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to concur in these Senate amendments where they occur in the joint resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HISCOCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC, BISMARCK GROVE, KANSAS.

Mr. HASKELL. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Military Affairs from the further consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 216) authorizing the Secretary of War to supply artillery and camp equipage to the encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic at Bismarck Grove, in Douglas County, Kansas, and that the same be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, &c. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to supply the encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic at Bismarck Grove, in Douglas County, Kansas, to be held in September, A. D. 1882, four pieces of artillery and such tents as can be conveniently spared, taking a sufficient bond for the return thereof after the encampment in as good condition as when received, all cost of transportation and other expenses to be borne by said encampment.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HASKELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DONATION OF CANNON.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. No. 2034) to authorize the Secretary of War to deliver certain cannon for monumental purposes to the Grand Army of the Republic at Westminster, Massachusetts; also to the Danville Light Battery A, Illinois National Guard, at Danville, Illinois, for monumental purposes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether it would not be better to pass a general law on this subject and leave its administration to the Secretary of War?

Mr. CANNON. I think it would. At the same time, as quite a number of such bills have already been passed, I hope my friend from Indiana will not object to this one.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table and read a first and second time.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to deliver to the Grand Army of the Republic Post at Westminster, Massachusetts, four condemned cast-iron cannon for monumental purposes; and also four condemned cast-iron cannon to the Danville Light Battery A, Illinois National Guard, at Danville, Illinois, for monumental purposes.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

GRAIN MILLS ON CANADIAN BORDER.

Mr. HAMMOND, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration and passage the bill (S. No. 1026) to permit grain brought by Canadian farmers to be ground at mills in the United States adjacent to Canadian Territory, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Treasury Department.

Mr. REAGAN and Mr. BAYNE reserved the right to object until the bill should be read.

The bill was read.

Mr. KASSON. This is a bill identical with one which has been reported by the House Committee on Ways and Means, and I suppose there will be no objection to it.

Mr. REAGAN. It seems to me that to permit grain in this way to come in free of duty would be a practice liable to abuse. I would suggest also that those who are urging high protection must take the bone along with the meat. I must object to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman to hear me for a moment. This is a practice that has continued for sixty years, until recently an officer of the revenue decided it was against the letter of the law. This bill is only to meet the case of those who come with wagon-loads of grain from Canadian territory to the nearest mill on our side and take back the grist, except the toll, which they leave behind.

Mr. BERRY. Have they got no mills on the Canadian side?

Mr. McKENZIE. If the bill is before the House I move to amend it by putting salt on the free list.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. And pig-iron.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Several members objected.

HENRY Z. BLINN.

Mr. STEELE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6684) authorizing the muster-in and discharge of Henry Z. Blinn; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTH OHIO INFANTRY.

Mr. STEELE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with a favorable recommendation the joint resolution (H. R. No. 178) authorizing and requiring the Secretary of War to deliver to the One hundred and eighth Ohio Volunteer Infantry Association the blue regimental flag which belonged to said regiment and which is now in the custody of the Secretary of War; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MARK WALKER.

Mr. STEELE also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 1401) for the relief of Mark Walker; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. JOYCE, for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. URNER, for two days, on account of important business.

To Mr. POUND, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. McCOID, until Monday next, on account of important business.

To Mr. RICHARDSON, of South Carolina, for ten days, on account of his health.

NATIONAL CEMETERY AT NEW ALBANY.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. No. 1825) making appropriation for the purpose of macadamizing a road from the city of New Albany, in the State of Indiana, to the national cemetery near said city.

Mr. ATKINS. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the bill called up by my colleague will at least be allowed to be reported to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands objection has been made.

Mr. ATKINS. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. The objection having been withdrawn, the bill will be read.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That $12,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of macadamizing a road from the city of New Albany, in the State of Indiana, to the national cemetery near said city, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended for right of way, nor shall any part thereof be expended unless the entire improvement can be made and completed for the amount herein appropriated: And provided further, That the road-bed shall first be properly graded and prepared without expense to the United States.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STOCKLAGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WARNER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 188) in regard to a monumental column to commemorate the battle of Monmouth.

TAX ON OLEOMARGARINE.

Mr. DUNNELL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 142, a bill (H. R. No. 6685) to tax the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. AINSLIE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a bill——

Mr. ATKINS. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HISCOCK: The petition of 200 citizens of Syracuse, and of 258 citizens of Onondaga County, New York, asking for the repeal of all internal-revenue taxes—severally to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. JOYCE: Six petitions of operators of woolen mills in Vermont, for an immediate correction of the error in the Revised Statutes relative to the duty on knit goods—severally to the same committee.

By Mr. RAY: The petition of Hon. D. W. Johnson and 6 others, of Judge William Clark and 9 others, of Hon. H. W. Parker and 44 others, of Hon. George H. Stowell and 83 others, and of Herbert Bailey and 55 operatives in the Bailey knitting mill, citizens of Claremont, in the State of New Hampshire, for the correction of error in the Revised Statutes relating to duties on knit goods—severally to the same committee.

By Mr. ROSS: The petition of citizens of Rahway, Union County, New Jersey, for an appropriation for educational purposes—to the Committee on Education and Labor.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, June 30, 1882.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou great and eternal God, who art the creator, the preserver, and the Supreme Ruler of the universe, it becomes us as Thy children, who were created in Thine own image and in Thine own likeness, and who are dependent upon Thee for life and for all its blessings, to acknowledge Thee in all our ways and to be obedient to all Thy commandments.

We thank Thee for all Thy great goodness and mercy to us as a people, for Thou hast blessed us above all the nations of the earth; Thou hast ordered our lot in a land of light, and of liberty, and of great abundance. We pray that we may never by our ingratitude and disobedience forfeit Thy favor, which is life, and Thy loving kindness, which is better than life.

Bless, we pray Thee, our rulers, the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, the Senators and Representatives in Congress, and all others in authority. Guide and assist them in the discharge of their responsible duties as the guardians of this great country.

O Thou great and merciful God, it hath seemed good unto Thee in Thine inscrutable providence to remind us again impressively of the shortness and uncertainty of life, and of the importance of being ever ready for our departure, by the sudden and unexpected death of one of the members of this Congress. Sanctify to us all this dispensation of Thy providence. So teach us to practice our duties that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom. We commend to Thy fatherly care and blessing those who have been sorely bereaved by this dispensation of Thy providence.

God, be merciful unto us, and bless and cause His face to shine upon us, and give us pardon and peace and eternal life, through Jesus Christ, our redeemer. Amen.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, July 1, 1882.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FEES OF WITNESSES.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent to report back at this time from the Committee on Appropriations the joint resolution (H. R. No. 243) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriations for fees of witnesses in the United States courts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, which it is very essential should be passed at once. It will only take a few moments to dispose of it.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It proposes to appropriate $60,000 to meet a deficiency in the appropriations for fees of witnesses in the United States courts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado, rose.

Mr. HALE. Let me explain the object of this measure before the Senator proceeds. There are a large number of star-route witnesses here in town waiting for money to be paid them; they cannot get out of town, and the Attorney-General writes a letter stating that it is very important that the joint resolution should be passed this week. I presume there will be no objection to it. The Senator from Colorado has an amendment to present.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado. I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the joint resolution come from a committee?

Mr. HALE. Yes; the Committee on Appropriations have considered it and directed me to report it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Colorado will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the joint resolution:

Provided, That all persons residing west of the Mississippi River, excepting those who are by law entitled to a higher compensation, who have been or are in attendance at Washington, District of Columbia, under subpœna as witnesses in any of the courts of such District, in any of the cases known as the star-route prosecutions, shall be entitled to receive a total per diem of $2.50 per day, and mileage to and from their place of residence, by the usual route of travel, at the rate of eight cents per mile; and an amount of money sufficient to pay the same is hereby appropriated, out of any money not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. HALE. That last clause can be stricken out, because the joint resolution as I reported it contains the appropriation. I suggest to the Senator to strike that out.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado. I did not know but this was needed as an additional appropriation. I do not know whether $60,000 will be sufficient.

Mr. HALE. I think that would be ample.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado. Then I agree that the last clause making the appropriation shall be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I should like to know what change the amendment makes in the existing law. I think it hardly proper that we should make changes in the law in regard to the attendance of witnesses on a joint resolution of this kind without an explanation or consideration. I hardly think it a good thing to do.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Colorado will explain his amendment, I suppose.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado. I think that no Senator who is acquainted with the circumstances under which these witnesses have been brought to Washington and detained here will object to giving them this additional allowance. Many of them have been here for over a month. They receive one dollar and a quarter a day, which is inadequate to defray their expenses. They come from Oregon, California, Nevada, and all the extreme western States and Territories. They are most of them poor men. They have had to leave their business at great personal sacrifice, and I think that it is just and right that they should have this additional allowance, which would be barely enough to cover their expenses.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator proposes an increased allowance for mileage?

Mr. HILL, of Colorado. From five to eight cents. It is an exceptional case.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think it an improper thing to give a special compensation to one set of witnesses over and above another, and I see no good reason for it.

Mr. SLATER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. SLATER. Is it an improper thing to do an act of justice?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That depends a good deal on what justice is. Sometimes simple justice to one person is not justice to another. I doubt very much whether it would be justice in this case. I object to changing the law as it now exists for any set of witnesses, not star-route witnesses merely, but any set of witnesses. If the law is proper for one class of people it ought to be for another. As I understand the question which is just presented here, it is proposed to double the compensation of the witnesses now attending the star-route cases over and above other witnesses, and I do not think that a proper thing to do.

Mr. HALE. I should like to say to the Senator this is a very exceptional case, and the amendment allows these witnesses but $2.50 a day.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Every case that takes money out of the Treasury is exceptional. I must object to the amendment, as it proposes to change the law in this way.

Mr. GARLAND. Allow me to state to the Senator from West Virginia that the position he takes, as a general proposition, it cannot be denied is right; the principle that he states cannot be questioned as a general proposition; but this is a very peculiar case and a very remarkable case. There are gentlemen from the State of Arkansas, who have been summoned here as witnesses in this matter, who have been here from six to eight weeks expecting to go upon the stand five and six weeks ago, and who have not yet been called because the testimony up to this time has been almost purely documentary. These persons have not been reached, and it is a hardship to keep them here any longer.

I would not have favored the amendment, which I do favor, offered by the Senator from Colorado, which he showed me before he presented it to the committee, but that I think this is such an exceptional case that if the Senator from West Virginia will consider it a moment he will not object to it. I agree with him clearly as to all cases, of course, but I ask him to look at this case for a moment. There are gentlemen from the State of Arkansas, absolutely poor, who have been unable to pay their expenses, and have been here six, seven, or eight weeks to testify, but who have not been called on the stand because the vast amount of documentary evidence has first to be gone through with.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. May I ask what change the amendment proposes to make in the existing law?

Mr. GARLAND. It gives them a dollar and a quarter a day additional, and eight cents instead of five cents mileage.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not see any reason why the mileage should be increased. There might be some good reason for the increase of per diem. If the Senator from Colorado chooses to let the law as to mileage stand, because I see no justice in changing that, I shall withdraw the objection as to the increase of per diem.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado. I did not hear the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from Arkansas says that the amendment proposes to double the daily compensation and to increase the mileage from five cents a mile to eight cents. I submit that the cost of travel in the case of these witnesses is no greater than in the case of other witnesses. It may be that on account of their detention here a dollar and a quarter a day will not pay their board, but five cents per mile largely more than pays their traveling expenses.

Mr. MAXEY. There are quite a number of men from the State of Texas. I will say to the Senator from West Virginia, who have been summoned to be in attendance on these trials. I am not prepared to say what the mileage is elsewhere, but I have a feeling knowledge of what it is in the State of Texas. There it is five cents a mile, and it is impossible for a man to come that distance, as most of these men have come from the frontier of Texas, across that great State and come here and pay their expenses here at a dollar and a quarter a day. In the mean time their business at home is suffering very greatly. Most of them are plain, poor men, farmers, and it seems to me that as they are here by the command of the Government, and as they have no spare money to spend and have to pay their own way, the proposition of the Senator from Colorado, about which I consulted with him before it was presented, is but fair. I think the Government would not suffer in that way. I think it is a just measure to the poor men who have been brought here by the coercion of a subpœna and are kept here against their will at the expense of their business at home.

Mr. SLATER. I desire to add to what the Senator from Texas has said that the States of Oregon and California have had a large number of witnesses drawn from there, and any person who reflects a moment will know that they cannot come that distance at five cents a mile. On many of the railroads the actual expense of traveling is greater than that.

Mr. MAXEY. I stated that in Texas the fare is five cents a mile on the railroads there.

Mr. SLATER. More than that, it is utterly impossible for them to pay their expenses on the allowance of $1.25 a day. To give them this compensation is nothing more than a simple act of justice, and does not nearly indemnify them for the losses sustained.

Mr. BUTLER. May I inquire what the amount involved is?

Mr. HALE. The appropriation given by the joint resolution as it came from the House is $60,000. It was presumed that that will cover all these cases; but after listening to what has been said I purpose, if the amendment of the Senator from Colorado is adopted, out of precaution, to move to make the amount $70,000 instead of $60,000, so that it will certainly cover the extra expenses incurred.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have no doubt that all these witnesses have incurred more expenses than will be covered by the joint resolution or the amendment added by the Senator from Colorado, but whatever we do now with reference to mileage of witnesses will become a standing precedent to govern all cases where witnesses are summoned before committees of Congress or before the courts of the country. While it might not be more than sufficient to indemnify those who are brought here for the expenses they have incurred, I doubt exceedingly whether we ought to adopt the amendment in reference to mileage and make it a precedent to be followed hereafter in all cases, whether the parties have lost by coming or not. I am satisfied that no witnesses are summoned before committees of Congress or before the courts without making sacrifices when they have to come in response to the summons served upon them; such witnesses have always made sacrifices; but the question now for us to determine is whether we shall adopt a precedent that must hereafter be followed in reference to all cases of this character.

I shall vote very cheerfully for the increase of the per diem, because everybody knows that a witness cannot maintain himself here upon $1.25 a day, but I doubt exceedingly the propriety of altering the general law in reference to mileage.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator from Maine whether or not the Attorney-General has written a letter on this subject?

Mr. HALE. He has. His letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, June 20, 1882.

SIR: It is of much importance to the Government that the deficiency appropriation of $60,000, or for fees of witnesses, United States courts, 1882, should be acted upon before the rest of the deficiencies asked for. If by a joint resolution of Congress it could be passed this week and be available at once it would relieve the Government of much embarrassment, save a large sum, and send home witnesses now waiting for their fees. An early consideration of the matter is respectfully urged upon your attention.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. Do I understand that these witnesses have been examined?

Mr. HALE. The witnesses are here, and most of them, perhaps all, have been examined, and are waiting for money in order to get home. It is a very urgent case. I do not think, after examining the amendment of the Senator from Colorado, that it is wise to object to it, although I realize the danger as a matter of precedent. It is a singular case, the summoning of men from their homes, thousands of miles away, to Washington to attend trials of this great national importance. It is a case which of itself, perhaps, will never be repeated. We have got to run some risk in all such special legislation of its being invoked in other cases not half so extreme as this; but I felt for one that I was willing to run that risk, although I do not like to do it. I hope we may get a vote upon the amendment, for I do not want to be in the way of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who has the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill ready for further action.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. President——

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator from Nebraska permit me to add one remark to what I suggested?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. MAXEY. I do not wish to be misunderstood. The roads in Texas, as I stated, make a charge of five cents a mile, and the witnesses have come here under that rate. Under a recent act of the Legislature of that State, which goes into effect some time this month—I do not remember what day—witnesses shall be allowed to travel for three cents, but they all come here, as I stated, at five cents a mile.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I simply desire to say that I happen to know personally some of these witnesses. I know two of them who live seventy-five miles from any railroad; they cannot get nearer than that to their homes by railroad, and have to take their chances of private conveyance or stages to get to their homes. I know at any rate that a number of witnesses here are now suffering, and in need of some relief of this kind.

So far as making a precedent is concerned, which was stated by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY,] I am in favor of making good precedents myself, and this is a good one. Let every case of this kind stand upon its own merits. These parties are suffering for the need of this money. I know that of my own personal knowledge, and I hope that some amendment of the kind proposed will pass.

Mr. MORGAN. I concur with the Senator from Nebraska that it is our duty to establish this precedent, and it is our duty to make a better provision of law than we are doing for the administration of justice. The Constitution requires that a party indicted in a criminal case shall be confronted with the witnesses, and when the offense occurs in the District of Columbia, and the witnesses live on the Pacific coast or elsewhere, very far from here, we must either refuse to administer justice or we must pay the expenses in a reasonable way of getting the witnesses here to confront the defendant, or else we must tax the administration of justice upon poor men who are unable to bear the expense.

The Government of the United States, if it can do anything at all, can afford to pay for the administration of justice. It is not the punishment of a single man and locking him up in the penitentiary, but it is the wholesome administration of the law and the enforcing of its power and authority against the commission of crime.

We have no trouble about paying marshals large fees, about paying judges good salaries who sit in causes, and so with all the other officers of the courts; and I think it is not right, indeed I think it is very wrong, that the expenditures necessary for the administration of justice under our Constitution should be taxed upon men who are unable to bear them. I hope the precedent will be established, and that the law will be reformed in this particular.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama whether five cents per mile will not pay the expenses of witnesses in traveling?

Mr. MORGAN. That may be sufficient for mileage, but a dollar and a quarter a day will not pay a man's expenses and feed his family while here a month in the administration of public justice when a man has been called away from his home.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from West Virginia propose an amendment to strike out "eight cents per mile?"

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I was about asking for a division of the question. I will let the Senate vote upon it. Let the question be first upon the per diem and then upon the rate of mileage.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado. I am perfectly satisfied from the investigation I have made of this subject that five cents a mile will not cover the actual expenses of these witnesses in traveling. Many of them have traveled hundreds of miles in coaches, paying from a dollar to a dollar and a half for each meal. Nothing less than eight cents a mile will cover the traveling expenses of witnesses from the far West.

I have in my hand a brief memorial from these witnesses, in which they state their own case, which I should like to have read. It will take but a short time.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

To Hon. BENJAMIN H. BREWSTER,
Attorney-General, Washington, D. C.:

SIR: We, the undersigned, citizens of Colorado, Nebraska, Wyoming, Montana, New Mexico, Texas, Nevada, California, Oregon, Idaho, Utah, and Arizona, would most respectfully represent that we have obeyed the subpœnas of the United States Government, and are here as witnesses in the star-route cases and have been in attendance since being subpœnaed.

We would further represent that the allowance of five cents per mile and $1.25 per diem is wholly inadequate to meet the expenses to which each and every one of us has been subjected, for the reason that some of our number have discontinued labor for monthly wages months ago and have been out of employment ever since because of their being subpœnaed in these cases, and their families are now without proper means of support. Others are on salaries from two to three thousand dollars per annum, and are not only losing their salaries, but are jeopardizing their positions.

Some are stock-growers; and for a stock-grower to lose the months of May and June from his business is nearly equal to losing the entire year.

One of our number is a railroad contractor, working two hundred men. The business greatly suffers from his absence even for a week or a day.

Many of our number have traveled several hundred miles more than the present regulation allows us to receive credit for; and they have paid as high as twenty cents per mile over stage lines and a dollar each for their meals while on the way; and all have paid more west of Omaha than the mileage allowed. Consequently they are out of pocket considerable sums of money for this trip and the one made in February when subpœnaed before the grand jury.

Others, again, have left their crops half planted, and thus, in effect, lose the entire work of the year.

Then others have sold their business at a great loss to themselves because of the necessity of attending these trials.

Some of our number are professional men, who have left their practice at a serious loss to themselves.

We present these facts for your favorable consideration; and while none of your memorialists expect to be paid for their entire loss, we would pray that provisions be made that will compensate us in a measure for these losses, and would most respectfully ask that we be allowed five cents per mile each way for the number of miles actually traveled and $1.25 per diem in addition to what is now allowed by law, and that you, as the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, will take such active steps and make such recommendations as will secure the above-named amounts to us. For which we ever pray.

Mr. HALE. I hope we may have a vote now on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Senate recognizes the necessity for additional mileage in the case of these far-away witnesses under one of its standing rules, where it provides generally that a witness before the Senate or its committees shall receive—

For each mile he shall travel in coming to or going from the place of examination, the sum of five cents each way: Provided, That witnesses residing west of the one hundred and tenth meridian shall be paid the sum of seven cents each way for each mile they shall travel in coming to or going from the place of examination when the place of examination shall be east of the Mississippi River.

Thus the Senate in regard to its committees recognizes the difference as to the scale of mileage between witnesses living in the East and those beyond the Mississippi River.

I hope that we may have a vote now upon the amendment of the Senator from Colorado, because I do not desire to take any more time of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia desires a division of the question on the amendment. The question first is on agreeing to that portion of the amendment fixing the total per diem at $2.50 per day.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment that the mileage to and from their places of residence by the usual route of travel shall be eight cents per mile.

Mr. HALE. I move to make that seven cents, in accordance with the rule of the Senate. I hope nobody will object to that.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Applying to those west of the Mississippi River in accordance with the rule of the Senate?

Mr. HALE. That is the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Colorado reads:

That all persons residing west of the Mississippi River, excepting those who are by law entitled to higher compensation.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado. I will accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from Maine, making the mileage seven cents.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend the joint resolution further by striking out "$60,000" and inserting "$70,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. COKE presented a memorial of citizens of Pickton, Texas, in favor of international arbitration for preventing war between the nations of America; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the petition of Elizabeth M. and Lydia M. Thornton, descendants of Obed Mitchell, of Nantucket, Massachusetts, in favor of the passage of the French spoliation bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. INGALLS presented a petition of the National Maimed Union Soldiers and Sailors' League, of Washington, District of Columbia, indorsed by U. S. Grant, in favor of the passage of a bill to grant an increased pension to soldiers who lost an arm or a leg or suffered an equivalent disability thereto in the service of the United States in the late rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Martin A. Patterson, late private of Company F, First Colorado Volunteer Infantry, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committe on Pensions.

Mr. MILLER, of California, presented a memorial of manufacturers of matches on the Pacific coast, remonstrating against the repeal of the stamp tax on matches; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 6419) granting four condemned cannon to Otis Chapman Post No. 103 of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Chicopee, Massachusetts, for monumental purposes; and

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 216) authorizing the Secretary of War to supply artillery and camp equipage to the encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic at Bismarck Grove, in Douglas County, Kansas.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 1825) making appropriations for the purpose of macadamizing a road from the city of New Albany, in the State of Indiana, to the national cemetery near said city; and

A bill (S. No. 2034) to authorize the Secretary of War to deliver certain cannon for monumental purposes to the Grand Army of the Republic at Westminster, Massachusetts, also to the Danville Light Battery A, Illinois National Guard, at Danville, Illinois, for monumental purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 188) in regard to a monumental column to commemorate the battle of Monmouth;

A bill (H. R. No. 6225) to authorize the changing of alley-ways in the city of Washington;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 224) accepting the offer of Dr. H. D. Cogswell, of San Francisco, California, to donate to the Government of the United States an ornamental drinking-fountain, to be erected at his cost in the city of Washington.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CAMDEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2005) to increase the pension of Elijah W. Penny, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2634) for the relief of Norton L. Newberry, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1147) granting a pension to Elizabeth Vernor Henry, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 70) granting a pension to Sarah Hayne, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BLAIR. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4719) granting a pension to Betty Taylor Dandridge, to report it without amendment, and to submit a report thereon. It is suggested that I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill. This is the daughter and the only surviving child of ex-President Taylor. She is in great destitution. She is the widow of Colonel Bliss, of the Army. Subsequent to his death she married again, and has lost her second husband. He died leaving her in extreme poverty. She is now dependent upon charity, and must remain so unless assisted by the Government. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. HALE. I hope there will be no objection to the passage of this bill. It is a case that will appeal to everybody. It is one of great necessity. This lady is the daughter of an ex-President. Her husband was well known, as well as her father, and I hope the Senate will let the bill go through without any objection.

Mr. MORGAN. I shall not object to the passage of the bill, but I desire to amend it by the insertion of the name of Mrs. Letitia Tyler Semple, the daughter of ex-President Tyler, who is here now in the Louise Home, a lady who has lost her eye-sight, and who is entirely destitute, and who is one of the most worthy and excellent ladies in the country.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill go over if it is to be amended.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection to the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not object to it. I want the bill to go through, but I want to amend it.

Mr. BLAIR. It is entirely impossible to hear the suggestions of Senators on account of the confusion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama wishes to amend the bill, and other Senators, in view of the pressing business before the Senate, object to its consideration.

Mr. BLAIR. I suppose a Senator has the right to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I am directed by the Committee on Territories to report a bill establishing the Territory of Pembina and providing a temporary government therefor, and I call the attention of the Senate for one moment to this bill.

Some time ago a bill was presented for the purpose of admitting Southern Dakota as a State and providing a territorial form of government for the northern part, which is included in this bill. If that bill had become a law there would be no necessity for this; but it is so late in the session that it is very doubtful now whether that bill can become a law at this session, and therefore the committee present this bill for the organization of a new Territory, taking off the northern part of Dakota.

What I want to say is, that this bill will be printed by Monday, and I wish every Senator interested in it—and I think all Senators are—to examine the bill, so that by Wednesday of next week it may be called up and acted on. It is an important matter, and it has been delayed for the reason I have stated.

The bill (S. No. 2114) establishing the Territory of Pembina and providing a temporary government therefor was read twice by its title.

Mr. BUTLER. I consented to the report of that bill, but I reserved the right, as the chairman on his own account did, to submit any amendments which I may choose to present.

OFFICIAL RECORDS OF THE REBELLION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to which were referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 39) authorizing the printing of 15,000 additional copies of the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion, and a concurrent resolution providing for printing 1,000 additional copies of the records of the war of the rebellion for the use of the War Department, to report a new joint resolution as a substitute for both; and I ask for its present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 87) authorizing the printing of 2,500 additional copies of the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion was read twice, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That there be printed and bound of the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion 2,500 additional copies; of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the War Department, 1,000 copies for the use of the Department of the Interior, and 500 copies for sale by the Public Printer.

Mr. SHERMAN. That involves over a hundred volumes.

Mr. ANTHONY. It will spread over a good many years.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not see why they should be printed for the Departments. A provision is made for public sale, I see.

Mr. ANTHONY. Here is a letter from the Secretary of War. I will give the substance of it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the original joint resolution be read.

The Acting Secretary read Senate joint resolution No. 39, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That there be printed and bound of the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion 15,000 copies in addition to those now authorized by law, to be distributed as follows: 3,500 copies for the Senate, 10,000 copies for the House of Representatives, 500 copies for the Executive Departments, and 1,000 copies to be distributed under the direction of the Secretary of War to such persons as have contributed valuable records to the war-records office of the War Department.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know why the joint resolution is so completely changed. The report makes a complete change in the whole structure of the resolution. I should like to have some reason for that.

Mr. HOAR. Is the joint resolution before the Senate under the rule?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a report of the Committee on Printing, a standing committee, and the Senator from Rhode Island asks for its present consideration.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have it go over until Monday. I should like to move an amendment, if the Senator from Rhode Island will not object, providing for a proper system of distribution of these records, and get the House to adopt it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to say that the original resolution contemplated the printing of 15,000 copies for the use of the Senate and House and the Departments. The committee have cut the number down to 2,500—1,000 for the use of the War Department, 1,000 for the Interior Department, and 500 for sale, and none for members of Congress. The War Department had 1,000 copies of the original edition. That has proved insufficient to supply military posts, officers of high rank, and especially persons who contributed valuable papers for publication, particularly from the confederate side. Many of these officers have been very liberal indeed, and have sent the original papers, retaining no copies of them. We thought it but a slight courtesy to them to give each a copy of this publication. That is the object of giving copies to the War Department.

Mr. PLATT. Before the matter goes over I should like to make an inquiry of the chairman of the committee. I do not know whether anything practical can be done in the way of carrying out the suggestion which I make. It had occurred to me that perhaps if these documents were stereotyped——

Mr. ANTHONY. They are.

Mr. PLATT. A small extra edition of the first volume might be printed for sale. I find that in a great many instances there is a call for the first volume to make up the full set, and if a small extra edition of the first three volumes should be printed they would all find ready sale. I merely make the suggestion.

Mr. ANTHONY. The resolution provides for printing 500 copies for sale.

Mr. PLATT. That extends to the whole list?

Mr. ANTHONY. It extends to the whole list.

Mr. PLATT. But there is much greater demand for the first volumes, by reason of the fact that some of them were distributed by members of the Senate and House who have since gone out, so that the present members of the Senate and House are unable to furnish them to the persons to whom they desire to supply copies.

Mr. ANTHONY. The same condition will apply to the second and third volumes in the course of time.

Mr. PLATT. Certainly it will.

Mr. HOAR. What is the probable number of these volumes?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is impossible to tell; I dare say 75 or 100.

Mr. INGALLS. The Public Printer told me that the number would amount to at least 90, and possibly exceed 100.

Mr. HOAR. What is the cost to the volume in round numbers?

Mr. ANTHONY. From fifty cents to a dollar.

Mr. HOAR. I allude to the cost of the edition.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should say 75 cents, 80 cents, or 90 cents a volume.

Mr. HOAR. How many volumes are published in the whole?

Mr. ANTHONY. Ten thousand.

Mr. HOAR. About ten thousand volumes in round numbers at ninety cents or a dollar a volume would take about a million dollars. The chairman of the Committee on Printing states that probably about a million dollars are to be expended for this one publication. It would be more likely that there are 15,000 copies, when the amount would be increased to a million and a half. We have no system for the distribution of these volumes which insures their preservation in the libraries where the public in the various neighborhoods in the respective States can have access to them. We have no system which insures the volumes of the set going to the same person or the same place, but they are used very largely by members of the Senate and of the other House simply to pay a compliment to gentlemen for whom they like to show their respect.

It is a very easy thing to send a gentleman by mail a volume worth a dollar or two; and some volumes published at Government expense are worth twenty times that amount. He puts it on a shelf, and makes the Senator or member of Congress his friend. He never reads it; he is not likely ever to read it; but he is selected as a person likely to be a friend of the Senator.

I understand that the Senate has repeatedly expressed its judgment that the system ought to be changed. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Printing has proposed a remedy for that state of things by recommending a bill providing for a different system of distribution. The librarians of the country have met in convention, and have memorialized Congress on the subject more than once, and they proposed the form of a bill to cure this vast evil, but the House of Representatives has never taken it into consideration.

It seems to me that we ought to annex to the resolution providing for the printing of these documents some such system as that which met the approval of my friend from Rhode Island for their distribution. I hope he will make this the occasion to put such an amendment on, and send it back to the House, and then they will consider it.

For that reason I desire the joint resolution to go over. I ask the chairman if he is not willing to allow it to be recommitted to the Committee on Printing, with a view of putting on it the measure which he has himself introduced, and which the Senate have passed on his recommendation. If he will consent to that, I will make a motion to recommit.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the matter had better lie over, and the Senator from Massachusetts can present his amendment if he wishes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions go over on objection.

HALL'S ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to which was referred a message of the President transmitting a communication from the Secretary of the Navy suggesting the publication of a second edition of "Hall's Arctic Expedition," to report it back and ask to be discharged from its further consideration. I hope that will meet the approbation of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL.]

The report was agreed to.

INTEROCEANIC COMMUNICATION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to which was referred a letter from the Secretary of the Navy transmitting the report by Lieutenant John T. Sullivan on the problem of interoceanic communication by way of the American Isthmus, to report a concurrent resolution, and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the report by Lieutenant John T. Sullivan, United States Navy, on the problem of interoceanic communication by way of the American Isthmus, be printed, with 5,000 additional copies, of which 1,500 shall be for the use of the Senate, 3,000 for the use of the House, and 500 for the use of the Navy Department.

Mr. INGALLS. Let us hear some explanation about John T. Sullivan's report.

Mr. HOAR. I object to the consideration of the resolution. Let it go with the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks the chairman of the committee to explain the resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Massachusetts objects and the resolution goes over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over on objection.

CRUISE OF THE TICONDEROGA.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to which was referred a message of the President transmitting the report of Commodore R. W. Shufeldt of his cruise around the world in the United States steamer Ticonderoga, to report a concurrent resolution, and recommend its passage.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the report by Commodore R. W. Shufeldt, United States Navy, of his cruise around the world in the United States steamer Ticonderoga be printed, with 5,000 additional copies, of which 1,500 shall be for the use of the Senate, 3,000 for the use of the House, and 500 for the use of the Navy Department.

Mr. HOAR. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over on objection.

STEAMBOAT COMMUNICATION IN FLORIDA.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the letter of the Secretary of War transmitting the report of Lieutenant-Colonel Q. A. Gillmore on opening a steamboat communication from Saint John's River by Topokalija Lake to Charlotte Harbor, on Peace Creek, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the report of Lieutenant-Colonel Q. A. Gillmore on opening a steamboat communication from Saint John's River, by way of Topokalija Lake, to Charlotte Harbor, on Peace Creek, be printed, and that 1,000 additional copies be printed for the use of the War Department.

SIGNAL SERVICE REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to which was referred a message from the President transmitting a letter from the Chief Signal Officer to the Secretary of War asking for the publication of 10,000 copies of the report of the Chief Signal Officer, to report a concurrent resolution directing that one-quarter of that number be printed.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That there be printed and bound for the use of the Signal Office and the Department of War 2,500 copies of the annual report of the Chief Signal Officer for 1881.

Mr. COCKRELL. What will that report contain?

Mr. ANTHONY. The report of the Signal Service. The Chief Signal Officer desires these to give to people who furnish gratuitous information. The Army surgeons at all the posts where there are no Signal Service stations make meteorological observations and transmit them to the Signal Office. He writes a very pressing letter asking for 10,000 copies. The committee have thought that 2,500 might answer. There are none for distribution by members of Congress.

Mr. INGALLS. That resolution might as well go over with the rest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over with the rest.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will try one more.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive the report.

DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 247) to provide for the printing of public documents for binding and distribution to those entitled to receive them, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. The usual number of documents is 1,900, of which one is given to each Senator and each Representative, a certain number to the document-rooms and libraries of each House, and a certain number to the Interior Department for distribution among public libraries according to the designation of Senators and Representatives. Sometimes when a document is ordered to be printed on an appropriation bill, as is frequently done, the distribution of it is fixed by law, so many for the House of Representatives, so many for the Senate, and so many for the Departments, and then the usual number which is printed when that document is ordered to be printed simply, is not added, and there are none for the document-rooms nor the folding-rooms nor for the libraries. This is to provide for that defect.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have had such poor luck that I shall not go on any further, but I hope that the Senators who have objected to the consideration of our resolutions will regard them as in their charge, and will be prepared to offer their amendments and call up the resolutions.

RAILROAD DOCUMENTS.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am directed by the Committee on Railroads to report the following resolution, and I ask for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the librarian of the Senate and the clerk of the document department of the Senate be, and they are hereby, required to furnish to the Commissioner of Railroads, for the use of his office, one copy of all reports and other documents relating to any of the subsidized railroads of the United States, of which there may be duplicate copies in the library of the Senate or in the document department.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why the necessity for that?

Mr. KELLOGG. The Commissioner of Railroads addressed me a communication asking that this resolution be submitted to the Senate, as he desires the data asked for by the resolution. He cannot procure them otherwise. The resolution gives him a copy of all reports made to Congress in regard to subsidized railroads for his information as an officer of the Government. I send his letter to the desk, and ask that it be read.

Mr. McMILLAN. I move to amend the resolution by inserting the words "land grant" instead of "subsidized."

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no objection to that. The information is what he wants, and it is in the document-room.

Mr. SHERMAN. Both terms ought to be used. It ought to be "subsidized or land-grant railroads."

Mr. INGALLS. Let the letter of the officer be read, so that we may know what he wants himself.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask that the letter be read.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF RAILROADS,
Washington, June 29, 1882.

SIR: I am very desirous of gathering into this office such documents as will facilitate the examination of questions touching the subsidized railroads, as many inquiries are made here which, for lack of access to the necessary documents, cannot be answered satisfactorily.

I submit to your consideration copy of a resolution which, if it meet your approval, I shall be glad to have passed by the Senate. A similar request has been sent to the chairman of the House Committee on Pacific Railroads, who approves it and will offer it for adoption.

I think it would be found of public convenience if all documents touching these roads could be found in one place.

Very respectfully, &c.,

W. H. ARMSTRONG,
Commissioner.

Hon. WILLIAM P. KELLOGG,
Chairman Committee on Railroads, United States Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota to insert the words "or land grant;" so as to read:

Subsidized or land-grant railroads.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. INGALLS (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2115) for the relief of Columbian University; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLAIR (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2116) for the relief of Isaac Polhamus, jr., and others; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOAR asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2117) fixing the salaries of the judges of the district courts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KELLOG asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2118) for the admission of marble columns free of duty for the Catholic church at Donaldsonville, Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

MARIA B. CRAIG.

Mr. BUTLER. On the 9th of May the bill (H. R. No. 3833) for the relief of Mrs. Maria B. Craig was reported from the Committee on Pensions adversely and postponed indefinitely. I ask that the vote by which the bill was postponed indefinitely may be reconsidered, and that it be placed on the Calendar for further investigation. I have been requested to have this done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, the order postponing indefinitely the bill will be reconsidered. The Chair hears no objection. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

L. S. ENSEL.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to have the bill (H. R. No. 230) for the relief of L. S. Ensel placed upon the Calendar. It is a case where I myself made an adverse report from the Committee on Claims, and the bill was postponed indefinitely. I move that the action indefinitely postponing the bill be reconsidered and the bill put upon the Calendar, at the request of a member of the House who desires that action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

CATHARINE JOHNSON.

Mr. HARRISON. The bill (S. No. 1494) for the relief of Catharine Johnson was reported adversely by the Pensions Committee on the 27th of June, and indefinitely postponed. I have the consent of the acting chairman of the committee [Mr. PLATT] and of the Senator who reported it [Mr. CAMDEN] to ask that the order indefinitely postponing the bill be reconsidered, and that it be recommitted to the committee for further examination.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is finished.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to give a notice at this time?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to say that the resolution reported by the Committee on Education and Labor, relative to strikes and the consideration of the labor question generally, now upon the Calendar, must necessarily give place to the appropriation bills, but I should like to call that resolution to the attention of the Senate next Tuesday morning immediately on the close of the morning business. Even if appropriation bills are then pending, I shall ask of those who are in charge of them the courtesy of a few moments to dispose of this resolution at that time.

Mr. COCKRELL. Tuesday will be the Fourth of July. Does the Senator want it considered on the Fourth of July?

Mr. BLAIR. Well, the day following.

Mr. ALLISON. That will be a good day for it.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator from Missouri desires to consider it on that occasion, I have no objection, but of course I wish it understood that it shall be considered on the legislative day immediately following Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senate is not in session that day, it can be taken up subsequently.

NEW ORLEANS AND NORTHEASTERN RAILROAD BRIDGES.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask the courtesy of my friend from Iowa to permit me to call up a bill which has been upon the Calendar some time, which was reported from the Committee on Commerce, authorizing the New Orleans and Northeastern Railroad to construct bridges over the channels of Pearl River and Lake Pontchartrain. Northern Senators have succeeded in getting eight or ten such bills reported from the Committee on Commerce passed, and I do not think there has been one from the South. Now, it does seem to me that this ought to be conceded me as representing that section, and I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill and pass it.

Mr. ALLISON. On the sectional appeal made by my friend from Louisiana, I yield for that purpose if the bill causes no debate.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1960) authorizing the New Orleans and Northeastern Railroad to construct bridges over the channels of Pearl River and Lake Pontchartrain.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the New Orleans and Northeastern Railroad Company, a corporation organized for the purpose of constructing a railroad between New Orleans, Louisiana, and Meridian, Mississippi, be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to construct, build, and maintain bridges over and across the navigable waters of the United States on the route of said railroad from New Orleans, Louisiana, to Meridian, Mississippi, as now located, or as said route may hereafter be located, for the use of said company, and the passage of its engines, cars, passengers, mails, and merchandise thereon: Provided, however, That said company shall construct its bridges over and across the waters known as East Pearl River, West Pearl River, and Lake Pontchartrain, in accordance with such plans devised for the safe passage of vessels as shall be approved by the Secretary of War; and that said company shall construct and maintain such facilities and be governed by such regulations for the passage of vessels as the Secretary of War shall approve.

SEC. 2. That any bridge built under this act and subject to its limitations shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post-route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States, or for passengers and freight passing over said bridge, than the rate per mile paid for the transportation over the railroad or public highways leading to the said bridge; and it shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post-roads in the United States.

SEC. 3. That if said bridges shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans, the spans thereof shall not be less than three hundred feet in length in the clear, and the main spans shall be over the main channels of the rivers and lakes across which said bridges may be constructed, and the bridges shall be at right angles to and their piers parallel with the current of said rivers and lakes: Provided, That if the same shall be constructed as draw-bridges, the draws or pivots shall be over the main channels of said rivers and lakes at accessible points, and the spans shall not be less than one hundred and sixty feet in length in the clear, and the piers of said bridges shall be parallel with and the bridges at right angles to the current of the channels, and the spans shall not be less than ten feet above high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, to the lowest part of the superstructure of said bridges: Provided, That said draws shall be opened promptly by said company, upon reasonable signal, for the passage of boats; and said company or corporation shall maintain, at its own expense, from sunset to sunrise, such lights or other signals on said bridges as the Light-House Board shall prescribe. No bridge shall be erected or maintained under the authority of this act which shall at any time substantially or materially obstruct the free navigation of said rivers and lakes; and if any bridge erected under such authority shall, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, obstruct such navigation, he is hereby authorized to cause such change or alteration of said bridge to be made as will effectually obviate such obstruction; and all such alterations shall be made and all such obstructions be removed at the expense of the owner or owners of said bridges. And in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said rivers caused or alleged to be caused by said bridges, the case may be brought in the district court of the United States of the States of Louisiana and Mississippi in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge may be located: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to repeal or modify any of the provisions of law now existing in reference to the protection of the navigation of rivers, or to exempt these bridges from the operation of the same.

SEC. 4. That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridges shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains or cars over the same, and over the approaches thereto, upon payment of a reasonable compensation for such use; and in case the owner or owners of said bridges and the several railroad companies, or any one of them, desiring such use shall fail to agree upon the sum or sums to be paid, and upon rules and conditions to which each shall conform in using said bridges, all matters at issue between them shall be decided by the Secretary of War, upon hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties: Provided, That the provisions of section 2 in regard to charges for passenges and freight across said bridges shall not govern the Secretary of War in determining any question arising as to the sum or sums to be paid to the owners of said bridges by said companies for the use of said bridges.

SEC. 5. That any bridge authorized to be constructed under this act shall be built and located under and subject to such regulations for the security of navigation of said rivers and lakes as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and to secure that object the said company or corporation shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawings of the bridges and a map of the location, giving for the space of one mile above and one mile below the proposed location the topography of the banks of the river or lake, the shore-lines at high and low water, the direction and strength of the currents at all stages, and the soundings, accurately showing the bed of the stream or lake, the location of any bridge or bridges, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject; and until the said plan and location of the bridges are approved by the Secretary of War the bridges shall not be built; and should any change be made in the plan of said bridges during the progress of construction, such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 6. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved; and the right to require any changes in said structures, or their entire removal, at the expense of the owners thereof, whenever Congress shall decide that the public interest requires it, is also expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 30th ultimo approved and signed the act (S. No. 1128) to authorize the Secretary of State to allow for expenditures within named to James Rea, late consul at Belfast, Ireland.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. Now I move to proceed with the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6244) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALLISON. I have three or four amendments that I desire to offer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] pending.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Alabama to withdraw it for a moment.

Mr. MORGAN. Very well, I will withdraw it.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 7, line 158, I ask unanimous consent to strike out the second "one" and insert "two;" so as to read:

For folding speeches and pamphlets at a rate not exceeding $1 per thousand, $2,500.

That making the amount for Senate folding $2,500, instead of $1,500. The Sergeant-at-Arms says he cannot get along with less than $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, on page 17, line 385, after the word "hundred," I move to insert "and eighty." There is a mistake in the amount for one of the assistants to the Librarian of Congress. It should be $480, instead of $400.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The correction will be made, there being no objection.

Mr. ALLISON. In the next line, the total should be changed correspondingly by adding $80.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That correction will be made.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 34, line 810, after the word "dollars," I move to insert "one clerk of class 4." It relates to the Life-Saving Service.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I suppose the chairman understands that that is adding an additional clerk.

Mr. ALLISON. I do, but I propose to strike out "three," where it occurs in the next clause, and insert "two," so as simply to provide for a fourth-class clerk instead of one of the third-class clerks.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. You add one of the fourth class, and strike out one of third class?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; restoring the "two" struck out in line 810.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So as to read, "one clerk of class 4;" and in line 810, restore the "two" and strike out "three" before "clerks of class 3."

Mr. CONGER. The Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service is very anxious that the reduction should be in the next line, striking out "two" and inserting "one;" so as to read, "one clerk of class 2." I hope the Senator will not forget that. I have gone over his list and the officers we have that are necessary. Instead of striking out "three clerks of class 3" it is proposed to strike out "two" before "clerks of class 2" and insert "one." That will correspond with the necessities of the office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. ALLISON. The Superintendent asked me to insert "one clerk of class 4," and take him from the clerks of class 3, provided for as the bill now stands.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator will remember that the Superintendent asked that the three clerks of class 3 might remain, and one reduced in the number of class 2. I have had a long conversation since then with him.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; I will not be particular about that. The amendment is to strike out "two clerks of class 2," so as to read "one clerk of class 2," as the bill came from the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment may be put in that shape.

Mr. CONGER. How will it read as amended?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "One clerk of class 4, three clerks of class 3, one clerk of class 2," &c. The Chair hears no objection to the amendment in this shape, and it is agreed to.

Mr. FERRY. The aggregate in lines 814 and 815 will have to be changed.

Mr. ALLISON. It makes a difference of $400, instead of $200 as I proposed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That correction in the footing will be made, adding $400.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 822 I propose to insert:

Nor to prevent the Commissioner of Internal Revenue from detailing one revenue agent for duty in his office.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Is it the intention to give the Commissioner two men?

Mr. ALLISON. On inquiry I find that the special agency service has no relation whatever to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; but inasmuch as the Treasury Department requested that to be inserted, I do not feel at liberty to strike it out now without further inquiry. I have not had time this morning to make inquiry.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It can be corrected in conference, if necessary.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir; but the amendment I have suggested is essential to the retention of one of these revenue agents here.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator will recollect that in committee we thought it was necessary to have one here, and this carries out that idea.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the attention of the chairman for a moment. I called the attention of the Senator this morning to page 98, lines 2404 and 2405. By some mistake the surveyor-general of the Territory of Dakota is put at $2,000, and each of the other surveyors-general for the other seven Territories has $2,500, while Dakota has the largest amount of lands and the greatest influx of settlers. I ask that that may be changed to $2,500.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. ALLISON. I think that ought to be done. Every Territorial surveyor-general except the one named by the Senator from Michigan receives $2,500. The Territory of Dakota is the most important surveyor-generalship we now have in the Territories. I know of no reason for the discrimination against him, and therefore I shall make no point of order.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The attention of the Committee on Appropriations was not called to it, and it looks just.

Mr. ALLISON. No; our attention was not called to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] will now be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. In the appropriations for the General Land Office, on page 87, line 2114, the amendment is to strike out "$1,800" and insert "$2,000;" in the same line, after the word "each," to insert "seven chiefs of division, at $2,000 each," and to strike out "thirty-two," in line 2114, and insert "twenty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

Three principal clerks, at $2,000 each; seven chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; and twenty-five clerks of class 4.

Mr. MORGAN. The effect of this amendment will be to decrease the number of clerks of class 4 by seven and also to add $200 to the pay of each of these clerks and make him a chief of division. It will also add $200 to the pay of the three principal clerks named in the statute and also in this bill. It distributes $2,000 among ten chiefs of division in the General Land Office. The former Secretary of the Interior and General Williamson, the late Commissioner of the General Land Office, recommended this change some two or three years ago, and the present Secretary has also recommended it, and it is in the Book of Estimates.

I wish to state very briefly to the Senate the reason for making this increase in the pay, and also in the authority of the persons named.

There is no chief of division in the General Land Office except by the assignment of clerks. Three principal clerks were authorized by the act of 1836, and their pay was put at $1,800. Since that time we have raised the number of clerks of class 4 to thirty-two, without making any allowance for those who are assigned as the chiefs of division. This is found to be unjust and also inconvenient in the Land Office, for the men who occupy the position of chiefs of division ought to have some discrimination made in their salaries. They have greater responsibilities, and have more duties to perform than the ordinary clerks of class 4.

More than that, this is a very modest demand; it has been long urged upon the attention of Congress, and has been neglected, very much, I think, to the detriment of the public service. I have had occasion during this session of the Senate at several times to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the General Land Office is very much neglected in the force we provide for it, and particularly in the classification of the clerks. There are men in this town who have made from $50,000 to $100,000 in the last ten or twelve years who received their education in the General Land Office. They are excellent men; they have done well; they are honorable men; but after they had become experts in the General Land Office, not receiving a sufficient compensation for the support of their families, they retired from the office and went into the practice of the law.

Some of the gentlemen who are there now have a good deal of professional pride; they have pride in their office; they have made up records which reach back through many years. I can cite particularly the chief of the mineral land division, who has been there since that division was organized, not many years ago, it is true, and who has accomplished himself I should say in rather an extraordinary way for the discharge of the duties of his office. He is working at a salary of $1,800 a year, when I suppose that he could receive compensation anywhere practicing the law upon the specialty I have mentioned of from five to eight or perhaps ten thousand dollars a year.

I hold in my hand some six or seven of the decisions that have been made by the chief of that division, and other divisions also, and some of these cases involve as much as a million dollars' worth of property. The records on which these decisions were based were, at least in many cases, a thousand pages of manuscript. It would require one of these eighteen-hundred-dollar clerks from two to three or four weeks to investigate the cause. The Commissioner of the General Land Office has very rarely overruled any of their decisions. They have been remarkably exact and remarkably painstaking and careful and successful in their decisions.

I submit that the Government of the United States ought not to expect to avail itself of talents of this character, and of information and accomplishments of this character, at the moderate pay of $1,800 a year, particularly when the Department has been so long urging this increase on the attention of Congress.

The growth of the Land Office since 1836 is something simply marvelous. Our country has grown enormously in that period of time, and we have neglected to provide for these officers a compensation at all in comparison with the mere growth of the business, to say nothing of the importance of it.

I trust that the Senate will concur with the recommendations of the Department and allow these gentlemen to have this very moderate allowance. It places a chief over each of the ten divisions of the General Land Office, all of which have been estimated for, and will start at least a very much better system of organization in the Land Office than now prevails. I assure the Senate that I believe there is no branch of the public service that requires attention more than that. I hope the amendment will be allowed to be made.

Mr. ALLISON. I make the point of order, being instructed by my committee to do so.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope the Senator from Iowa will not make any point of order. As is undoubtedly known to the Senate a sub-committee of the Committee on Public Lands, of which the honorable Senator from Alabama who has just addressed the Senate was the chairman, investigated the condition of that office during the vacation and the early part of the present session. All that the Senator has stated is true and very much more——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from New Hampshire suspend? The Senator from Iowa will state his point of order.

Mr. ALLISON. My point of order is that the amendment changes existing law.

Mr. BLAIR. And the existing law ought to be changed; it very much needs to be changed, and I hope the objection will not be made on that ground.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to say this about a change of the existing law: I do not think the objection taken by the Senator from Iowa is good under the rule, because whenever we increase an appropriation here we change the existing law, and this bill contains a great number of changes. It does not rest with the Committee on Appropriations to change the existing law. The object of this rule was to cut off the Committee on Appropriations, as well as any Senator, from making any proposition in a bill of appropriations to change the general law. I never have believed that it referred to that change in the general law which was exactly germane to the subject under consideration, as, for instance, the increase of an appropriation or even a reduction of an appropriation. Those changes that are contemplated in the rule, I submit to the President of the Senate and to the Senate, relate to the introduction of foreign matter—that is to say, general legislation respecting the whole country—upon an appropriation bill. There is no effect of this as general legislation, except that it takes a few more dollars out of the Treasury and pays them to the employés of the Government. It does not incorporate a system of law different from that which prevails for the general administration of public affairs, but it applies to a special subject and is entirely germane to that subject. I have never known this rule to be applied to a case of this kind.

Mr. PLATT. Is not this making an appropriation for the clerks in the General Land Office? Is it not making a law? Is there any law for the purpose except as we make it this year?

Mr. MORGAN. As to three of them there is an act of 1836, to which I referred a while ago, that created the three principal clerks in the Land Office and fixed their salary at $1,800. As to the remainder there is no general law, as the Senator from Connecticut suggests; this is the making of a law and every appropriation bill is the enactment of a law on this general subject. If this rule is to be applied to this case I do not know why it might not be applied everywhere. I could object to almost every appropriation in this bill because its effect is to change, as is said, the existing law.

That was not the object of the rule. The object of the rule was to prevent the Committee on Appropriations, as well as any Senator, from changing the general law of the land through riders imposed upon appropriation bills, but it never was intended to prevent the Congress of the United States from dealing with the subject of appropriations and saying whether a particular salary was large enough or was too large. If we change it in one direction, we can change it in another. I do not think the point is well taken, and I hope the Senator from Iowa and the committee will not insist upon it. It is a very great hardship. Here is change after change of this character made in the Senate as to almost every department of the Government, and there is no Senator who can rise and state a stronger case than is proven in this instance by the sworn testimony of the officers of this department to which I have just referred as to the necessity of this improvement in the condition of that office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What provision of law is there on this subject? Is there any general law, or is it altered every year by the appropriation bill?

Mr. MORGAN. It is altered every year?

Mr. ALLISON. Three principal clerks were established, as the Senator from Alabama has stated, by a law of Congress. Now, there is another law which provides for the force in the several Departments, and it grades the clerks into first, second, third, and fourth class clerks. Of course, this proposition is to establish a new class of clerks in the Land Office.

Mr. MORGAN. It proposes only to raise the salaries of ten of these clerks, seven in one class and three in another, from $1,800 to $2,000 a year. It is not the change of a general law of the land, nor is it general legislation within the meaning of the rule which prohibits the committee, and the Senate also, from introducing measures of general legislation on these bills.

I confess I am surprised at the committee coming in with this objection now after I thought I had an understanding that no objection was to be made. The committee, I think, are not acting with the sort of liberality that ordinarily influences them. But I am not appealing to the liberality of the Senate, I am appealing to its justice, and I am appealing to a duty that we owe to the people of this country to enable these cases to be decided and to enable the business of that department to progress. Congress has obstructed it long enough; it is time that the homes of the people were free from the difficulties that environ and embarrass their titles, and that they had patents for their lands. We have got their money and promised them patents, promised an adjudication and a decision of their causes, and we withhold the force and the proper organization necessary to have this promise fulfilled.

Mr. ALLISON. After what the Senator from Alabama has stated, I think I ought to explain that the committee considered this question as fully as they could when the bill was before them. The Senator from Alabama has already reported a bill upon this subject.

Mr. MORGAN. No; not touching this particular branch of it.

Mr. ALLISON. But on the general subject of the reorganization of the General Land Office. We have inserted here, as the Senator very properly stated, new officers. The Senator could have made the point of order, doubtless, upon the additional assistant-commissioner reported to be provided.

Mr. MORGAN. I never thought it was any part of my business merely to obstruct public justice.

Mr. ALLISON. So on the inspectors; but the Senator made no point, and no other Senator made a point. The committee instruct me to make this point of order, and therefore I feel bound to do it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is well taken, inasmuch as the amendment changes the existing organization of the Land Office.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask whether the point of order is well taken as to the seven chiefs of division where there is no statute? It may be as to the three, but not as to the seven. There is no statute which requires that there shall be seven clerks or any other number of clerks of class 4.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The act, as the Chair understands, is silent on that subject; then adding to it changes the existing organization. The Chair would rather not accumulate points of order on the Senator from Alabama, but he must decide upon the law as it is.

Mr. MORGAN. I will appeal and test the sense of the Senate to see whether or not the Senate believe this is such a change of the existing law as is contemplated in the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama takes an appeal from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand, notwithstanding the appeal?

Mr. SHERMAN. On this question of order there is but one side. I have no objection to the amendment if it can be made in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair decided that the amendment of the Senator from Alabama changed the existing organization of the Land Office, and therefore sustained the point of order. The Senator takes an appeal from the decision of the Chair, and the question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. HOAR. Let the amendment be read once more.

The Acting Secretary read the amendment of Mr. MORGAN.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Alabama has made some serious charges against the Committee on Appropriations. He charges that there was an understanding that they would not make any question on this amendment, and notwithstanding that they make the point of order. I should like to know what he means by that.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not go to committees for agreements. I have presented this question to the Senate.

Mr. BECK. What was the understanding referred to that the point of order would not be made?

Mr. MORGAN. I presented the amendment to several gentlemen of the committee, and I understood they would not make any point of order.

Mr. BECK. It was not the committee that made the point. The chairman of the committee has made the point of order.

Mr. MORGAN. But he said it was done by order of the committee.

Mr. BECK. There is no member of the committee who has not a desire constantly to do whatever is recommended as being necessary for the good of the service in connection with the General Land Office, and the best evidence of it is in the official paper I hold in my hand. In 1879, three years ago, the total number of employés in that bureau was 169, in 1882 the total number allowed was 229, an increase in number in those three years of sixty employés in order to facilitate the public business. The amount allowed in 1879 was $220,360, the amount allowed in 1882 was $287,820, an increase in the amount of 1882 over 1879 of $67,460, and a further increase is allowed in this bill, the efforts of the committee all the time having been to move forward as rapidly as it was possible to do consistent with the provision that had to be made for the other branches of the public service.

I have no doubt that each bureau of each Department of the Government, if a special committee was appointed to report just what it wanted, would demand more than it has at this time. You cannot go to any bureau and follow its opinions of what is best without having demands made for increase of salary, increase of force, increase of accommodations. But the Land Office, being regarded as a very important bureau, there is no bureau in any Department of this Government that in the last three years has been advanced one-half as much; I leave out the Pension Office, growing out of our changes of the law—a number of them quite unfortunate, in my opinion—but I have said enough about that, and I do not care to start that again. Aside from the Pension Office no bureau in any Department of the Government has been advanced as rapidly, either in the amount allowed to it or in the increase of employés, as the General Land Office.

I have looked over the very able report of the Senator from Alabama, and I have looked over the increase recommended; and I now present the statement to which I have referred, showing the allowance of force to the General Land Office in 1879 and in 1882.

Clerical force General Land Office.

Officers, &c.	Number, 1879.	Number, 1882.
Commissioner	1	1
Chief clerk	1	1
Law clerk	1	1
Recorder	1	1
Principal clerks	3	3
Clerks of class 4	5	16
Clerks of class 3	22	30
Clerks of class 2	40	40
Clerks of class 1	70	62
Clerks at $1,000	6	30
Draughtsman	1	1
Assistant Draughtsman	1	1
Assistant Messenger	7	9
Laborers	8	12
Packers	2	6
Copyists	.....	15
Total number	169	229
		169
Increase in number 1882 over 1879	.....	60

Amount for 1879	$220,360
Amount for 1882	287,820
Increase in amount for 1882 over 1879	67,460

This bill still further increases the force, and is a fair limitation upon the amount necessary to be expended in justice to the other bureaus of the various Departments. I have no doubt that the demands of the General Land Office will be cared for faithfully, as they have been in the past. It was because we had done so much, because we were inquiring and endeavoring to ascertain whether the Commissioner was making his present force do all they could, or whether he was getting this great increase from us to allow the old routine methods to prevail without requiring good service from those we were giving him, that we thought we should not go further at present, and hence thought the point of order ought to be made to give us a chance to see whether or not we were getting service in proportion to the advance we were making. Here sixty additional employés have been given and $67,460 additional money to pay them within three years, and additional employés are given now and additional money appropriated now, and it is time we were inquiring with some care whether the Commissioner is using that force and using that money as efficiently as they ought to be used.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Kentucky evidently has not read that report, or he would not make an intimation that the officers of the General Land Office were not diligent in the discharge of their duties, or that there was any waste of time or any neglect of the public business in that office.

Mr. BECK. I do not say there is, but we want to know what the facts are.

Mr. MORGAN. The Committee on Public Lands made a report based upon sworn testimony; they did not rely upon ordinary statements; they swore the witnesses, and every chief of division in that office but one, I believe, swore that very frequently he occupied a large part of the Sabbath, and almost daily he occupied many hours outside of office hours as required by the regulations, both day and night, in the transaction of public business. I undertake to say that there is no department of this Government in which the men are so hard worked as they are in the General Land Office, and there is not one that can be named in which they are more faithful or more intelligent.

If the labors of that committee in bringing this subject to the attention of Congress have not passed simply for nothing, then the Senator's remarks are entirely unfounded, and he as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, which seems to have charge of all the public business of this country, ought to have informed himself before he assumed the responsibility of making any such intimations. They are totally unfounded; not only that, but they are contrary to the fact.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator state what I said that he so pronounces?

Mr. MORGAN. I understood the Senator to say that we had furnished more force to that department than to any other, and that the officers in the Land Office were not discharging their duty to the public.

Mr. BECK. I said no such thing, and the ears of the Senator from Alabama are very bad if he assumes that I said that. I said that in my judgment we had furnished more proportionate increase to that bureau than to any other bureau outside of the Pension Office, and I said we desired to ascertain whether they were working up the force we had given them to the best advantage, before going much further in that direction.

Mr. MORGAN. There is the proof, and I sent it before the Committee on Appropriations, the sworn evidence, which informs the Senator, if he has read it, as evidently he has not done, as to what is being done in this department. We cannot take as ex cathedra all the remarks made by the Senator from Kentucky when he states them right in the teeth of the evidence presented to his committee, and which he never has read. A guardianship of the public interests of that sort does not amount to much. It may do to talk about on the floor of the Senate, but it does not amount to anything in favor of the people.

If the number of employés in the Land Office has been increased more rapidly than in any other bureau than the Pension Office, what is the reason for it? It is because the business of the Land Office has increased more rapidly than that of any other department. It has outstripped all expectation and calculation; and we here, with a vast domain added by acquisition from Mexico since 1836, are proceeding with the same number of principal clerks we had then, without a responsible chief of division in any of the divisions of the Land Office. We have neglected our duty on this subject, and from this time forward I shall know where the responsibility rests.

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom the Senate refers evidence taken under oath on this question, neglect even to inform themselves of the contents of the paper, and then come in here and make statements directly the reverse and in contradiction of that record, and assume the responsibility of making a technical point of order to prevent the people from having their rights from this Government. That is the situation the Appropriations Committee put themselves in. They can stand in that position if they choose to do so, but their responsibility shall be perfectly understood by this country.

Now, sir, here is the General Land Office with one hundred and fifty thousand undisposed-of cases. As I have stated frequently on the floor of the Senate, at least fifty thousand of these cases are in severe litigation. The highest-paid officer, head of a division, in that department is an eighteen-hundred-dollar clerk, and cases, as I have stated here and the record shows it, that involve more than a million of dollars of money and a thousand pages of record are decided by an eighteen-hundred-dollar clerk; and when for three or four years the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior have urged upon the Senate in regular annual reports some rearrangement of the business force in that office, Senators arise and make questions about what?

Do they challenge the truth of these reports made by the Secretary of the Interior, or do they challenge the testimony found in the report of the Committee on Public Lands, which they never have condescended to read? No, sir; nothing of that kind. They assume to themselves the responsibility, and they shall have it, too of deciding that the people of this country shall not have patents to lands that they have paid for, some of these cases being now twenty to twenty-five years old, and are standing there merely because Congress has not furnished adequate force to work up the cases. The current business in the Land Office cannot be transacted by the force we have now got. That the committee ought to know, but they do not know it, or if they do they will not believe it, although witnesses swear to it. The current business in the Land Office cannot be discharged day by day by the force in that office, and hence this great accumulation, this mass of business which has grown up like a burden upon the conscience as well as the business of the country in consequence of the neglect of some department of Congress to make the proper appropriation.

The Secretary of the Interior comes here from term to term of Congress and makes application for these little sums of money to enable him to do the public work; but because these land titles that we owe to the people are perhaps nine-tenths of them due to men who have not got the money or the influence to come here and make lobby demands for their titles, we cannot have anything done. Put a man here with a pension claim or any other claim against the Treasury of the United States, it makes no difference how absurd it may be, and let him have a lawyer to come about here to stir up the conscience and memory of Senators about it, and we find these claims brought in here and agitated before Congress, leaving one hundred and fifty thousand undisposed-of cases in the General Land Office, where we have got the money of the people and refuse them titles, and that, too, upon technical objections which are extremely technical, and which, applied to this committee and applied to the amendments that have been offered here, would tear this bill in tatters and leave nothing of it.

Sir, I am for justice, and nothing but that. I have not come here to put in a plea for the General Land Office; I do not want to beg any money out of the Senate of the United States to increase the salaries of the employés of the General Land Office; but, sir, I do want something done here that will enable the people who are clamoring for their titles to get them out of that office. There the papers lie in those vaults and in those presses, and they are being destroyed by vermin. Here is the sworn testimony showing that many a land title that once was good and could have been perfectly established has been lost because Congress has refused to make an appropriation until the vermin and the damp and the mold have destroyed the records upon which the titles depend.

Now, sir, I do not believe that this objection is well taken. This is not an amendment that proposes general legislation. Rule 29 is that—

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill, nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill be received—

This is admitted to be germane—

nor shall any amendment to any item or clause of such bill be received which does not directly relate thereto—

This does directly relate thereto—

and all questions of relevancy of amendments under this rule, when raised, shall be submitted to the Senate and be decided without debate; and any amendment to a general appropriation bill may be laid on the table without prejudice to the bill.

That is Rule 29. Now Rule 28 is:

All amendments to general appropriation bills moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, proposing to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add new items of appropriation, shall, at least one day before they are offered, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and when actually proposed to the bill, no amendment proposing to increase the amount stated in such amendment shall be received; in like manner, amendments proposing new items of appropriation to river and harbor bills shall, before being offered, be referred to the Committee on Commerce, &c.

I do not find in any section of these rules any statement that new legislation shall not take place. That phrase I do not find in the rules, and yet it is often quoted here as if it was in the rules. The object of the rules was not to prevent new legislation, but it was to prevent general legislation, for if we want to reduce the amount of an appropriation for last year which a person received, that would be in a sense new legislation, but it would not be general legislation, and so if we wish to increase it. But here the Committee on Public Lands recommend the increase; the Secretary of the Interior recommends it; he puts it in the Book of Estimates; it is carried before the Committee on Appropriations; it is in every authentic form that it can be put unless the Congress of the United States, in reference to the General Land Office, intends to require of the Committee on Public Lands that they shall bring in a bill fixing the salary of every man in that office.

Why, sir, the inconvenience of such a construction as that is shown in this very debate, for there is no trouble about this case at all except that arising out of the act of 1836. That act provided that three principal clerks should be appointed in the General Land Office to receive a salary of $1,800 each; there is nothing said about the other seven; and if the point of order obtains at all, if it is valuable anywhere, it is only as against the three, and not as against the seven. These seven clerks are already provided for with salaries of $1,800; not the thirty-two clerks that are allowed by this bill. I move to change them merely as to the price, that is all, and call them chiefs of division, and it is not the creation of a new office, and if it was it would be entirely germane to the bill, as I think, and it ought to be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair decided that this point of order was well taken, upon the ground that the act creating the General Land Office was radically changed by this amendment. It provides for "seven chiefs of division;" the whole system is changed; it changes the existing law on that subject. An estimate of a Department cannot justify an amendment if it changes existing law. The Committee on Appropriations can adopt it, it is true, but the rule says an amendment may be proposed in pursuance of estimate, and this is proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of a Department, but that estimate changes the existing law. "Seven chiefs of division" changes the existing law.

Then, again, it is said here this is not general legislation. The whole bill consists of general legislation from one end to the other. Any thing is general legislation that changes the existing law. This bill, from one end to the other, is full of general legislation.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to say this: I have never seen any act creating the General Land Office which said whether there should be or should not be chiefs of division.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair used to be very familiar with the law creating the General Land Office, as he had more business in that department than any other, and he is perfectly aware without its being pointed out to him that this changes the general organization of the Land Office.

Mr. MORGAN. I have examined the law with some care myself, and I find only this: that there are three principal clerks provided for in the act of 1836. It says nothing about chiefs of division one way or the other; it neither provides for them nor against them, but does provide for three principal clerks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would vote for the amendment if he had opportunity to do it, but the Chair believes the point of order is well taken.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no doubt the Chair does believe it; but if the whole of this bill is general legislation then this committee have taken large liberties with the Senate and with the law of the land, for they have no more right to change the general legislation of the country than I have got as a Senator on this floor, or to propose a change.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless the Senate sustains them.

Mr. MORGAN. Unless the Senate sustains them! But we ought to have some understanding about this. I understand that the rules of the Senate are for the regulation of committees as well as for the regulation of Senators, and that no committee has a right of its own motion to violate the rules of the Senate. I know they take those liberties; I understand that perfectly well; but after they take as many of them as they choose I think it is a little harsh in them to come in and object on questions of order where somebody else wants to be heard. It has got to be so that a man has no place in the Senate, no power, no right unless he is on the Committee on Appropriations.

I do not think, Mr. President, the term "general legislation" mentioned in Rule 29 relates to such alterations as are germane to an appropriation bill, and in that sense of the word I do not think that all the provisions of the appropriation bill are general legislation. If they be so, it puts the legislative power upon appropriation bills exclusively in the hands of one committee, and I do not think that was the intention of the rule. The object of this rule is plain enough. It is that an appropriation bill shall not be allowed as a vehicle to carry into execution purposes of legislation not germane to the bill. That is the object of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from Kentucky stated that previous to the present year there had been an increase in the General Land Office of $67,000 appropriated and of sixty clerks. In addition to that I wish to state that this bill provides nineteen new clerks for the Land Office, fifteen of which were added by the House and four by the Senate; also an assistant commissioner of the General Land Office, and that the amount of compensation this year over that of last is a little upward of $50,000, showing that there has been a large increase in this particular bill as it was reported to the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Senator if he knows how much the increase of business in the General Land Office has been the last year?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not know.

Mr. MORGAN. It has been very great.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do know this: that the committee heard all that the representatives of the Land Office had to say, and that they believed they gave it full as many clerks as were necessary to perform the business. The committee heard the Land Office chief, with others, and this was the conclusion.

Now, as to the arrangement that the Senator wishes, that is another question. I sympathize with him to a considerable extent in the amendment he wishes, but you must bear in mind that the Committee on Appropriations have increased this bill largely, and if the Senator's amendment prevails he himself will see that it ought to be reduced in other particulars; and as it stands now, as I understand it, it is accepted in the Land Office as being a proper way of working in that office.

Mr. MORGAN. I am not so informed. I am informed just the reverse; that the Secretary of the Interior is not satisfied with it.

Mr. ALLISON. Only one word, Mr. President. I sympathize with this proposed increase in the General Land Office myself personally, and I believe that the business in that office is constantly on the increase; but we have provided in this bill as it came from the House sixteen fourth-class clerks additional.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator will certainly do me the justice to say that I am not asking any increase in the number of clerks.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that; but I am saying this in response to some remarks made by the Senator to the effect that the responsibility of not keeping up the current work of the Land Office would be upon this committee, because we had not furnished the necessary force. Now, there are sixteen additional fourth-class clerks proposed for the Land Office in this bill; there are ten clerks of class 3 proposed additional in this bill; and there are twelve clerks of class 2 proposed additional in this bill. We have given the Commissioner an assistant commissioner, which he has never had before. We have provided, also, for an increase in some of the miscellaneous appropriations for the Land Office. So that the Committee on Appropriations, as the Senator from Kentucky says, has dealt liberally with this office. We did not do all that it asked us to do; and because we did not do that another committee or a member of a committee having in charge the reorganization of this office (which measure, when it comes up, I doubt not that I shall vote for) comes in and scolds the Committee on Appropriations because we do not, forsooth, do all that he wants us to do. I should be glad to have my friend from Alabama upon the Committee on Appropriations for a little while to see how he would like to have every Department and every bureau of this Government come to us with voluminous papers, covering pages of writing and printed matter, asking changes and alterations and new provisions in these appropriation bills.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the honorable Senator indulge me in one remark? If I was a Senator on the Administration side of this Government, I would bestow what little power and effort I had to make the force of the Government adequate to the public wants and necessities, if it did cost money to do it.

Mr. ALLISON. We have made an honest endeavor to do that thing; and I will say to the Senator that if the current business of the Land Office does not appear to be up with the demands of the service when we come together here in December, I shall be willing to increase still further the clerical force of this department. But we have added fifty-six employés to the force in the General Land Office in this very bill; and yet, because we did not recommend seven chiefs of division, the Senator from Alabama finds fault with the committee.

Mr. BECK. I desire only to say a word or two in reply to the criticisms of the Senator from Alabama about never having read anything or knowing anything and about usurping power, and stating what I did not know to be true——

Mr. MORGAN. The honorable Senator will not regard me as having said that he stated as a fact that which was not so.

Mr. BECK. The RECORD will substantially show, I think, that the Senator made such statements as I have just mentioned.

Mr. MORGAN. I said this, which the Senator admitted, that he had not read the report and the evidence.

Mr. BECK. I said before the Senator made that statement that I had read that report.

Mr. MORGAN. The evidence?

Mr. BECK. No; your report.

Mr. MORGAN. The evidence was what I spoke of.

Mr. BECK. It was because the Senator from Alabama came to me and asked me to read his report that I did read it, and it was because I did read that report that I called upon the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations to let me know what we were doing for the General Land Office; and when he showed me that we had given them in three years sixty additional clerks and $67,000 additional appropriation, with a further increase in this bill; and when the sub-committee who had charge of it were looking into it carefully, and I asked them what they were doing, and they showed me that they had given fifty-odd thousand dollars more in this bill, added to the $67,000 given before, I thought they were acting liberally. That having been done, and it being more than was done for any other bureau or any other Department of the Government, because I took the pains to learn that much at the request of the Senator from Alabama after reading his report, thinking something ought to be done, then we are told that we are a set of usurpers who are constantly changing the law; that we have no regard for the public; that no man has any right here unless he is a member of that committee. Now, I propose to him to resign my place on that committee and put him there.

Mr. MORGAN. I will accept.

Mr. BECK. You will accept it now? Very well, let the change be made to-day, and let him go on in my place. Mr. President, I now request that to be done. I resign my place upon the Committee on Appropriations, and ask that the Senator from Alabama accept it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is another question before the Senate. The question is on the appeal of the Senator from Alabama from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

The question being put, the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. BECK. Now I ask that my resignation as a member of the Committee on Appropriations be accepted, and I ask for the appointment of the Senator from Alabama in my place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair might accept the resignation, but the Chair is engaged on this bill at the present time, and the interposition of another matter is not in order.

Mr. VOORHEES. I heard it stated once by a very wise man in this country that it was no time to swap horses while we are crossing the stream. I would suggest that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill is before the Senate, and no foreign matter can be entertained by the Chair.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to ask that this bill be amended on page 21, line 496, by inserting after the word "dollars," in that line, the words:

Chief of appointment division, $3,000.

I desire to state that, following in the line of my friend from Alabama, I want to unload some complaints or criticisms upon the Senate that I think are well taken. The Secretary of the Treasury addressed a communication to the Committee on Appropriations calling attention to three officers in his Department, stating that their duties were arduous and difficult, and urging an increase of their compensation. The Committee on Appropriations for some reason saw fit to grant the request of the Secretary of the Treasury as to two; but, not intending to do an act of injustice, have omitted to include the other officer whose compensation was asked to be increased by the Secretary of the Treasury. I am sure it was an unintentional omission, because the Secretary of the Treasury gives better and stronger reasons why the officer omitted should have the benefit of an increase of salary than he does in the other two cases. It must be known by every one who knows anything about the office and the duties incumbent on the officer that the appointment division chief should have his salary increased, if either of the other two should. I do not suppose there is any objection on the part of any of the members of the Committee on Appropriations because they do not like this man or because he has not done them any favors.

Mr. COCKRELL. Who is the man? I never heard of him.

Mr. KELLOGG. The chief of the appointment division of the Treasury Department.

Mr. COCKRELL. Who is he? I do not know him. I never heard of him that I know of.

Mr. KELLOGG. The chief of the appointment division of the Treasury Department.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know his name.

Mr. KELLOGG. The three officers were the head of the mail service, the topographer, and the chief of the bureau of appointments. These three officers were recommended to the Committee on Appropriations as diligent officers whose duties were onerous and difficult, requiring a superior order of talent, making special exactions on their time and ability, and the Committee saw fit to increase the salary of two, but omitted one. It seems to me that is an unjust discrimination, and I stand here for justice. I have no sort of feeling in the matter, but it has been brought to my attention, and I should like to know if it is improper to inquire in this august body of the Committee on Appropriations how it happened that they discriminated against this very efficient officer, for I think all will admit that he is an efficient officer?

Mr. ALLISON. I raise the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is sustained.

Mr. FERRY. On page 108, line 2657, in the appropriations for the office of the Solicitor of the Treasury, between the words "dollars" and "chief clerk," I move to insert:

One law clerk, $2,500.

Mr. ALLISON. I raise the point of order.

Mr. FERRY. And, in the same line, I move to strike out "four" and insert in lieu thereof the word "three," as the number of clerks of class 4. The object of my amendment is not to increase the number of clerks, but to simply give the law clerk of the Solicitor's Office, who writes many of the opinions, and is detailed by the Department to defend the United States in suits throughout the country, adequate pay. He is now paid as a fourth-class clerk, $1,800; this is increasing his pay to $2,500.

I take the ground, if that duty is necessary, we should pay properly a man who is competent to discharge that duty for the Government, and in doing that we ought to pay him such salary as is adequate to the duties performed, and certainly $1,800 cannot command a proper lawyer to discharge the duties which are now imposed upon him.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was simple enough to believe that the Solicitor of the Treasury wrote the opinions and was paid for that service. If this clerk writes those opinions and does the responsible duties of the office, and the others are mere figure-heads, they ought to be retired in the interest of the public service, and this man placed at the head.

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator had observed exactly what I said he would have seen that I did not say that he wrote all the opinions; I simply said he wrote many of them. It is very common, as the Senator well knows, and none knows it better than the Senator from Missouri, that many subordinates do a large amount of work that perhaps the superiors get credit for. That pertains to all pursuits and departments of life. The solicitor cannot perform all these duties, and therefore this clerk is required to aid the solicitor in their discharge. Now, because that is a necessity, ought you to require a clerk to do such duties on the pay of $1,800, that of a fourth-class clerk? It is great injustice to a legal mind employed in the discharge of duties connected with the Treasury Department. I have no reflection to make on the Solicitor of the Treasury. I know him well; he is an able man and discharges his duties faithfully; but I find in my duties here as a Senator—and I believe I am about as industrious as the average of this body—that I am unable to perform all the duties required of me. I have to have a secretary, a short-hand reporter, for I cannot write all my letters.

Mr. COCKRELL. And you voted against every other Senator having one.

Mr. FERRY. What?

Mr. KELLOGG. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. FERRY. What does the Senator from Missouri mean?

Mr. COCKRELL. I mean that you voted against other Senators having the same privilege you have, under the resolution offered a few days since.

Mr. FERRY. I state to the Senator that on the simple proposition of authorizing every Senator who has not a secretary to employ one I should vote for it. What more does the Senator want?

Mr. COCKRELL. That was precisely what the Senator voted against the other day.

Mr. FERRY. Yes, in an appropriation bill, where it was not applicable, I did vote against it there, at the same time telling the Senator that I would vote with him on the general proposition, and I think I was for it before. That was why I plead for the messengers. I favor it because I believe that our legislation would be wiser if every Senator had a secretary, so that more of his time could be given to presence here and to reflection and study and research upon questions that come before the Senate. I am compelled to come in here with both pockets full of letters and to catch time here at my desk to answer these letters, letters that it is necessary for a Senator himself to answer, for there are many letters that cannot be dictated. That is known to all Senators. If that be the case, then some provision ought to be made; and if the Senate is not willing to give a secretary to every Senator, we must take help as we can get it; then certain ones must have it, certain messengers must be employed, and so we are coming to it step by step.

In this case, when this law clerk at $1,800 does this duty and necessarily because the Solicitor cannot do it all himself, I say it is rather niggardly if we refuse to pay him an adequate compensation for his discharge of important duties.

Mr. ALLISON. I make the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. FERRY. What is the point of order?

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that at the conclusion of the few remarks I submitted in support of the amendment I offered a while ago, my friend from Iowa simply rose in his seat and, pointing his august finger at the Chair, said, "I make the point of order," and I sat down when the Senator made the point of order. He made the same point of order in the same manner quite as emphatic at the conclusion of the remarks made by my friend from Michigan, and this debate has gone on for ten or fifteen minutes now. I should like to resume the debate on my amendment. I want the same chance. I stand again for justice.

Mr. FERRY. But the Senator was more quiescent than I propose to be. He took his seat without responding to the Senator from Iowa. What is the point of order?

Mr. ALLISON. This is the creation of a new office. That is the only point I have made.

Mr. FERRY. This is simply increasing the pay of a clerk.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no such officer known now.

Mr. FERRY. Designating him as law clerk does not make a new office; he is simply a clerk. Putting "law" before "clerk" does not make an office, and the number is reduced in the next line, so that it is not an increase of the number, but simply designating one as law clerk. He is still a clerk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "One law clerk, at $2,500," is making a new office.

Mr. FERRY. Then I have a right to amend my amendment by striking out "law;" so as to read:

One clerk, at $2,500.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then that increases the appropriation.

Mr. FERRY. It increases the appropriation $700 in the aggregate. That is the complement of my amendment. I have reduced one clerk of class 4. It does not increase the number of clerks, but increases the pay of one clerk by saying "one clerk, at $2,500," and reducing in the next line the number one, leaving the same number of clerks, but giving one clerk $2,500 instead of $1,800.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does in the aggregate increase the appropriation. The Senator has a right to test the sense of the Senate as to a rearrangement if thereby the aggregate is not increased.

Mr. FERRY. But I add to the aggregate, as has been done in several cases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is raised that the amendment in the aggregate increases the appropriation.

Mr. FERRY. Then on what grounds is it ruled out? I have given notice, and I have the recommendation of the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask consent, pending this matter, that the five-minute rule as to debate be applied to this bill during the remainder of the day.

Mr. MORRILL. On the amendments?

Mr. ALLISON. On the amendments and the bill.

Mr. FERRY. My amendment is in print, and I have the recommendation of the Committee on Finance. I think it comes within the requisition of the rule.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the five-minute rule be applied to debate on this bill and all amendments to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks that the rule be applied that each Senator may speak five minutes and not more than once.

Mr. COCKRELL. That was not the motion as I understood it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thought so.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understood the motion was to limit debate to five minutes to each Senator, not saying anything about a Senator speaking more than once.

Mr. ALLISON. The usual five-minute rule.

Mr. COCKRELL. But not a limitation that no Senator shall speak more than once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the limitation in the language of the rule.

Mr. ALLISON. That is on any particular amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri object to the enforcement of that rule?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The judgment of the Chair is that the amendment of the Senator from Michigan changes the law concerning the office of the Solicitor of the Treasury, that it creates an additional clerk, so that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. FERRY. Before the Chair concludes his decision may I ask if increasing the clerks named in the bill is creating a new office any more than increasing the amount of an appropriation named in the bill, coming within the rules otherwise?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It creates an office.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I submit also that it is increasing the appropriation, and is out of order on that ground.

Mr. FERRY. If I have given notice of my amendment and had it referred to the Committee on Appropriations and have it recommended by a Department, I have met the rules and have a right to increase the appropriation.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. From what committee does it come?

Mr. FERRY. The Committee on Finance, I have already stated. That committee includes the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] who is posted on all questions intelligently.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Did I understand the Senator to state that the Committee on Finance recommended an additional clerk here?

Mr. FERRY. They recommended the amendment that I proposed to offer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "One law clerk" was the amendment as offered.

Mr. FERRY. I have stricken out "law," so that it now reads "one clerk."

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is something new, for the Committee on Finance to recommend the appointment of a clerk.

Mr. FERRY. Does the Chair rule that I have no right to amend my amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment as recommended was "one law clerk." Why the Committee on Finance should recommend this, the Chair cannot say. It is not appropriate to that committee.

Mr. ALLISON. It is rather a mystery to me.

Mr. BUTLER. I rise to a point of order. I understand the Chair has decided the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has already decided it, and if debate is to continue after questions are decided the bill will never be got through with.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer the following amendment, to come in on page 109, after "dollars," in line 2680:

Provided, That no copyright shall be allowed on any volume of the reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and said reports hereafter published shall not be sold by the reporter at a price exceeding $2.50 per volume.

Mr. ALLISON. I rise to a point of order. That is legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. MORGAN. It is new legislation, but it is only an amendment of new legislation reported by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That makes no difference. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. MORGAN. I appeal from the decision of the Chair——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee can legislate, but——

Mr. MORGAN. I deny that proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair means that the committee can report anything that they choose——

Mr. MORGAN. I very respectfully deny that proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At any rate, the point of order is sustained.

Mr. MORGAN. I have appealed from your decision, sir. Now, Mr. President, I desire to be heard. I am willing to yield my time to the Senate of the United States, but I cannot do it under compulsion. I cannot be forced to do it at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Alabama that anything in relation to the reporter of the Supreme Court of the United States is legislation. The House legislated upon that subject. The Committee on Appropriations moved to strike out that legislation, and the Senate agreed to the committee's amendment. Now the Senator from Alabama moves general legislation upon that subject, that the reporter shall not have a copyright in his reports. If that is not general legislation, the Chair does not know what is.

Mr. HOAR. If I may be pardoned for a moment, let me ask the Senator from Alabama, is he aware that the Supreme Court have directly decided in the case of Wheaton vs. Peters that there can be no copyright in these reports?

Mr. MORGAN. I had the impression that there was such a decision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No copyright in the decisions of the court.

Mr. HOAR. Of course, I suppose, the reporter might treat his own particular form of head-notes as something to be copyrighted; that is the statement of the case.

Mr. MORGAN. That is the very point I desire to meet by this amendment. The reporter is a salaried officer of the Government of the United States and makes up these reports.

Mr. HOAR. Practically anybody who wanted to publish a new series of the decisions, as Judge Curtis did, as the Senator will recollect, could make his own head-notes. The facts are not capable of copyright, nor the decisions; so that I say with great deference to my honorable friend from Alabama that practically there is no copyright now.

Mr. MORGAN. I was informed the other day when this subject was up by the Public Printer that the cost of printing and binding in sheep the reports of the Court of Claims is from seventy-five to eighty cents a volume. They are sold for $5 by some speculative arrangement which I do not understand at all. But with the information that reports of that character can be printed for from seventy-five to eighty cents per volume and bound in sheep in the manner in which that is done, I thought it was the duty of the Senate to reduce the price of these reports to $2.50, and I supposed that inasmuch as the House itself had legislated upon this subject and we had stricken out that legislation and had changed it back to a salary of $5,000 for the Supreme Court reporter without any other change in the law——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is mistaken in that; the change leaves the salary just as it was.

Mr. MORGAN. I mean $2,500; I miscalled the figures.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate struck out all the legislation in that regard.

Mr. MORGAN. Twenty-five hundred dollars is the salary the reporter now receives from the Government of the United States. I thought it was not only germane but entirely in order that we should further legislate upon the subject by saying that he should not receive as a part of his compensation a copyright upon the book or that he should not receive more than $2.50 per copy. The law now provides for $3, and I have always understood that an amendment which reduced the public expenditure was in order, so that if I wanted to reduce the price of the reports which he has a right to sell for $3 a volume to $2.50, that would be in order.

After having made that statement I will not press this matter, because I find that nothing is in order upon this bill that is not desirable.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear the amendment of the Senator read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Acting Secretary read the amendment of Mr. MORGAN.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to make one additional statement about this matter. At the time this subject was up I arose and suggested that I had some amendment I wanted to offer. It was then suggested that we go through with the committee amendments, and then go back to the bill. In my opinion, if I had offered this amendment at that time it would have been all right; but it is not right now. I shall have to submit, I suppose, to a decision that it is out of order.

My proposition is to reduce the price of the reports from $3 to $2.50; and that reduces the expense to the Government and to the people also. It is further provided that the reporter shall have no copyright, which, as the honorable Senator from Massachusetts says, is the law now as decided by the Supreme Court, only making it applicable to the statements of the cases, instead of to the decisions.

Well, sir, at some future time perhaps I shall have an opportunity of bringing the subject to the attention of the Senate and of the country, and I shall not fail to do so.

Mr. BECK. Is the appeal still pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. BECK. If so, I desire to say that when the Senator from Iowa called up the bill I asked the question whether or not the committee amendments were first to be acted on and then the bill would be open to all other amendments by other Senators; and the Chair and the Senator from Iowa both answered "yes," as the RECORD shows. The House had legislated upon this subject, and the Senator from Alabama would have had a perfect right at that time to add anything to that provision of the House that he saw fit, because this House cannot determine any question of order relative to the action taken by the other House, and the House of Representatives having inserted new legislation in these words:

The reports of the decisions of said Supreme Court shall hereafter be printed at the Government Printing Office, under the supervision of the reporter, and sold by the Public Printer at cost of publication with 10 per cent. in addition thereto.

That was part of the bill as it came to us and was not subject to a point of order. Every right of every Senator to make any amendment to the bill as it came from the House was reserved, because as a matter of convenience the right was given to the committee to have their amendments acted on first without prejudice to the rights of any other Senator; and the RECORD shows that fact at the very beginning of the consideration of the bill.

I do not believe the Senator from Alabama is in any worse position now as to moving any amendment to the House provision than he would have been in if he had moved it as the section was read, because the action of the committee was allowed to go on without any interruption until they were through with their amendments to the bill, and then it was to be open as though the bill had just come from the House, with every word in it as it came from the House, or else I misunderstood the whole thing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate, notwithstanding the appeal of the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. MORGAN. I withdraw the appeal, and give notice that I will move this amendment in the Senate and ask for a separate vote on the amendment put on the clause by the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. Reserving the committee amendment for separate action?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, reserving everything on that.

Mr. INGALLS. I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to the clerical force now employed in the Bureau of Military Justice, as it appears upon page 73 of the bill between lines 1772 and 1775 inclusive. A very large increase of clerical force has been allowed the Pension Bureau, and for the purpose of facilitating the decision of cases pending there additional force has been permitted to be reported in favor of the Surgeon-General's Office and the Adjutant-General's Office and the other offices in which the evidence in support of pension claims is examined.

The Judge-Advocate-General, who is at the head of the Bureau of Military Justice, informs me that with the force at his disposal as reported in this bill it will not be possible to facilitate the consideration of pension cases, which has been contemplated by the additional force allowed the other Departments. It appears to me that in order to make the system symmetrical, if it is the design of the committee that the consideration of these cases shall be expedited, it is absolutely essential that an increase of force should be allowed the Bureau of Military Justice, where a very large portion of the evidence that is considered in these cases is to be found. If the channel through which the evidence flows is not made entirely open and unobstructed in its course from the beginning to the end, nothing will be practically gained by the great addition to the force of the Pension Bureau. If there is a congestion or a stoppage in any one of these different offices where testimony is required, so far as the decision of these cases is concerned it might as well exist in all of them. I would suggest to the Senator from Iowa whether or not it would not be advisable to allow the small additional number of clerks that the Judge-Advocate-General suggests is necessary in order to carry out the purpose of the committee in regard to the adjudication of pension cases.

Mr. ALLISON. The committee considered this question. The Judge-Advocate-General presented to us a letter at some length giving the character of the duties of his office, stating that quite a number of these pension cases were referred to his office for one purpose or another, and we were inclined I think to give him the force that he asked for; but on further examination and inquiry of the Secretary of War he stated that he thought this additional force was not required, and therefore we did not put it in. I confess to the Senator from Kansas that my mind is not quite clear on that subject, and if the committee will consent, I should be glad to add one or two clerks here, so that we may fully consider this question in conference.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Is it proposed to add one?

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest that we add one of each class; that is, one clerk of class 4 and one clerk of class 2.

Mr. INGALLS. The Judge-Advocate-General handed me a memorandum comprising what he thought was the requisite force for the transaction of the additional business that would necessarily come to his office in consequence of the acceleration of business resulting from the increased clerical force in the other Departments. He says there should be one chief clerk. I now read his schedule, irrespective of what appears in the bill. There should be one chief clerk, two clerks of class 4, two clerks of class 3, one of class 2, four of class 1, and one clerk at $1,000; two copyists at $900; one messenger, one assistant messenger, and one laborer.

Mr. ALLISON. I cannot think all that force is necessary.

Mr. INGALLS. The addition would be two clerks at $1,800, one at $1,400, one at $1,200, and one laborer, making an addition of four clerks and one laborer to the force now employed.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to insert "one clerk of class 4;" and I hope my friend from Alabama will not make the point of order on that additional clerk of class 4 that he is not authorized by the statute.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to inquire of the Senator having charge of this bill how many clerks have been added to the Pension Bureau by this bill?

Mr. ALLISON. The Pension Bureau, or all of these offices?

Mr. SAULSBURY. All connected with the adjudication of pension claims.

Mr. ALLISON. The report of the committee gives an exact list. I think seven hundred are added.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The chairman has reference to the Pension Office now; nearly eight hundred are added in the Pension Office, twelve hundred in all.

Mr. ALLISON. The Pension Office increase is between seven and eight hundred; I think nearer to seven hundred.

Mr. SAULSBURY. There is a practical illustration of the error of taking the first wrong step. We commenced with the arrears-of-pension act, and this is the legitimate fruit and outcome of that act; and now, after the committee with great liberality have provided for nearly twelve hundred additional clerks connected with pensions, another application is made by the Senator from Kansas for the purpose of making the symmetry complete, that we shall have four more additional clerks.

Mr. President, I think we ought to stop somewhere the expenditure for this purpose, and especially the expenditure of public money for clerks. If we took 2 per cent. of the salaries of those already in the service and put that in the hands of the Pension Commissioner, he, perhaps, could secure all the additional force required; but every additional clerk that is added in this bill becomes a part of the machinery to run the Republican party hereafter by imposing on them 2 per cent. of their salaries to help defray the expenses of the campaign. I do not say this proposition is drawn for that purpose, and yet that will be the result; and I am for several reasons, and for one political reason, opposed to this multiplication of offices.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to add "one clerk of class 4" to the Bureau of Military Justice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the amendment will be agreed to. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the aggregate be changed in that subdivision.

Mr. ALLISON. That will be a necessity. Add the salary of one fourth-class clerk to the footing, $1,800.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That change will be made.

Mr. CALL. On line 496, page 21, I move to insert "one chief of division at $2,750;" and in the same line to strike out "seven" and insert "six;" so as to read "six chiefs of division at $2,500 each."

Mr. ALLISON. The word "seven" has already been stricken out and "eight" inserted, so that the latter part of the amendment cannot be considered. While I am not clear that a point of order lies to this amendment, I hope it will not be adopted. It is in order to continue the chief of the division of captured and abandoned property at a salary of $2,750. We voted yesterday that we would not do it. I hope we shall not reverse that action to-day.

Mr. CALL. I understand that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] withdrew his motion yesterday and no vote was taken upon it, and the chairman of the committee accepted a proposed substitute inserting "eight" instead of "seven." I do not understand that there was any vote on the subject. However, I have introduced the amendment because I was requested to do so, and I think the officer has a right to be heard on the subject.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand that very clause was amended yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "Seven" has been changed to "eight," in line 496.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It was amended yesterday by adding one chief of division, which gives this officer $2,500, and I know the only object of the amendment of the Senator from Florida is to give this officer $2,750.

Mr. ALLISON. That is what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moved substantially the same amendment as the Senator from Florida does now, but afterward, on consultation with the chairman of the committee, it was agreed to raise "seven" to "eight" chiefs of division.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. At a salary of $2,500.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope my friend from Florida will not persist in this amendment. I think this clerk, whoever he is, ought to be satisfied and not pursue this question much further.

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Iowa will acknowledge that every employé of the Government ought to have a hearing, and if he presents a good case it ought to be decided. Now, I do not know this gentleman; I never heard of him before. I am simply responding to a request from him, with some papers, stating that he thinks he has a right to this compensation. The papers which he has presented to me very clearly evidence that fact. He is estimated for by the Secretary at $2,750, the salary which he has been receiving all the time. I understand from the papers which have been presented to me that his duties are as follows:

1. To preserve the captured and abandoned property records and files and confederate archives, and to furnish information therefrom generally, or in special cases in response to resolutions of Congress and calls of the several committees thereof.

2. To answer rules of the Court of Claims for information and papers, if not injurious to the public interest.

3. To furnish to the Attorney-General all facts, information, and proofs which are or may be within the knowledge or in the possession of the Department in all cases brought against the United States in the Court of Claims, including all cases arising under the general jurisdiction of the court.

4. To examine and refer for payment judgments of the Court of Claims, and to determine questions of set-off against such judgments.

5. To furnish to the Secretary of State for the use of the French and American claims commission information from the books, records, and papers of the Department and confederate archives in claims before said commission.

I am informed that this officer has rendered very laborious and very valuable service, saving a large amount of money to the Government under that provision of his duties.

6. The preservation of the records of the Southern claims commission and furnishing information therefrom upon the request of committees of Congress and in answer to inquiries of claimants.

7. The custody and protection of lands and other property of the United States.

8. The preservation, collection, or sale of wrecked, abandoned, or derelict property, &c.

9. To prepare and furnish duly authenticated copies of the books, records, and papers of the Department in all proper cases under Treasury order of October 20, 1880.

10. To answer letters and verbal inquiries of individuals desiring information in regard to captured and abandoned property, claims against the United States, lands in charge of the Treasury Department, and generally all matters pertaining to the foregoing.

I am informed that these duties are reported by the Secretary as important duties—they manifestly are upon their face—and that the officer performing them has rendered very valuable service, and is necessary to the proper performance of the public service, and he has estimated for him the salary which he has been receiving for years, and I understand states it is right he should have it. Under these circumstances I think it proper to submit the amendment, and I hope the Senate will concur in it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a correction needed in one amendment inserted the other day. In line 244, after the word "dollars," to strike out "one" and insert "four." The correction will be made, no objection being interposed.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask for a general concurrence in the amendments, unless some Senator desires to reserve any one.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to reserve the amendment on page 109 in regard to the Supreme Court reports.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be reserved. Is there any other amendment which any Senator desires to reserve? [A pause.] Will the Senate concur in the amendments, except the one on which a separate vote is desired by the Senator from Alabama?

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment reserved at the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. On page 109, line 2679, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, struck out "five thousand" and inserted "twenty-five hundred; and in line 2680, after the word "dollars," struck out the following words:

The reports of the decisions of said Supreme Court shall hereafter be printed at the Government Printing Office, under the supervision of the reporter, and sold by the Public Printer at cost of publication with 10 per cent. in addition thereto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment just read.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by substituting in place of the words stricken out, after the word "dollars," in line 2680, the following:

Provided, That no copyright shall be allowed on any volume of the reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States; and said reports hereafter published shall not be sold by the reporter at a price exceeding $2.50 per volume.

Mr. HOAR. I make the point of order on that amendment. The Chair has already ruled that it is out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The whole bill is in the Senate now; the question is whether it is not open to amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly, but it is not in order to move to a general appropriation bill a new substantive piece of legislation, under our rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is another point.

Mr. HOAR. That is equally true whether the bill as it comes from the House has one substantive piece of legislation in it or not. The Senator is not moving to amend any provision which is in the bill. He proposes a new legal enactment, giving the force of a positive statute to a principle in regard to the right to copyright these reports.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has no doubt about that point. The Chair was consulting the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] whether an amendment was allowable at all, as this was simply a question to concur with the committee.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to say this——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point is well taken. The Chair believes that this is a new subject-matter proposed to be introduced in the bill, and that it is general legislation. In the opinion of the Chair it is immaterial whether the subject to which it relates was general legislation proposed by the House of Representatives or not; but the amendment here, if the point is taken, is open to that objection.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not wish to detain the Senate about this matter, but I think the Senator from Massachusetts would hardly make the point of order if he realized the actual situation of the case before the Senate at this time. This bill as it is here now is the bill as it came from the House of Representatives, with the proposed amendment by the Committee on Appropriations. That proposed amendment is to strike out "$5,000" in line 2679, and that was new legislation put in this bill by the House, because the salary of the Supreme Court reporter before that time stood at $2,500. That is the attitude of the case now, and in that attitude of the case I propose to amend in concurrence with the report of the committee.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator is not making the point as strongly for himself as I understand it to be. I did not understand that he was moving to amend the mere amount of the salary, but the motion was to insert after the word "dollars," in line 2680, the other part.

Mr. MORGAN. That is my motion.

Mr. HOAR. It is stronger for the Senator than he is stating it.

Mr. MORGAN. That is my motion.

Mr. HOAR. My point is this: suppose it to be true that the House of Representatives propose in an appropriation bill that the reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court shall be printed at the Government Printing Office, and sold at 10 per cent. in addition to the cost; that undoubtedly is before the Senate as it came from the House. We cannot by our rules limit what they shall send to us. It is undoubtedly new legislation. That I concede. But it is none the less true that Rule 29 affects all amendments which may be proposed in the Senate, and we cannot propose to the new legislation offered us by the House other new legislation distinct under the guise of amendment, although it relates to the same subject-matter. The House say that the reports shall be printed at a certain place and sold at a certain price. The Senator proposes to add to that a new enactment about the ownership of the copyright. That I object to.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Massachusetts still does not comprehend my position. Perhaps I am unfortunate in not being able to state it so that he can comprehend it. It is this: the bill we are acting upon now is the text of the bill as it came from the House. I think that proposition will be undisputed. It being the text of the bill as it came from the House, the Senate has no right to raise a question of order on the House as to whether there is new legislation in it or not. It has a right to vote it down if it wishes, but it has no right to raise a point of order. Therefore, the text of this bill is in order before the Senate.

The Senate Committee on Appropriations proposed to amend by striking out "$5,000" and inserting "$2,500." They proposed further to amend by striking out all that follows in that clause: "The reports of the decisions of said Supreme Court," &c. I propose to amend the amendment of the committee by allowing them to strike out what follows, and substitute in place thereof an amendment which is germane to the subject that the House put upon the bill; and if the text, as the House sent it here, is a proper subject for consideration and not open to a point of order, then I have the right to substitute in place of that something else germane to the same subject, but varying the character of the legislation. If that were not so, we should be compelled always to take what the House sends to us and vote it up or vote it down without any opportunity to change the frame of it or to change the purport and meaning of it at all. I therefore think the objection of the Senator from Massachusetts on the question of order is not well taken, that this subject is before the Senate, and is therefore open to amendment in the Senate. That is the proposition I make and only that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there an appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. MORGAN. I will not appeal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the resolution of the Senate of February 28, 1882, to print 1,000 additional copies of the list of merchant vessels.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 6689) to remove the political disabilities of James I. Waddell;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 174) for printing the report of the Life Saving Service;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 249) amending a paragraph in the "act for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department," approved May 1, 1882, "and to correct an error in the enrollment thereof;" and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 250) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue 2 per cent. bonds or certificates in exchange for bonds bearing a higher rate of interest.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 3831) to create a district for the inspection of hulls and boilers of steam-vessels; and

A bill (H. R. No. 6519) to authorize the construction of bridges over the rivers Saint Mary's, Satella, Little Satella, and Crooked, in the States of Georgia and Florida.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. BECK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 6675) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSTON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 6616) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSTON and Mr. JONAS submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 5538) to reduce internal taxation; which were referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CALL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 6419) granting four condemned cannon to Otis Chapman Post No. 103 of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Chicopee, Massachusetts, for monumental purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 6689) to remove the political disabilities of James I. W. Waddell was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 174) for printing the report of the Life-Saving Service, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 250) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue 2 per cent. bonds, or certificates, in exchange for bonds bearing a higher rate of interest, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

GRAND ARMY ENCAMPMENT IN KANSAS.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 216) authorizing the Secretary of War to supply artillery and camp equipage to the encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic at Bismarck Grove, in Douglas County, Kansas, was read twice by its title.

Mr. INGALLS. If there is no objection, I should like to have that joint resolution passed. It is in the ordinary form, and merely authorizes the Secretary of War to issue tents, &c., to a Grand Army celebration at Bismarck Grove, in my State, in September.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I move to take up the deficiency appropriation bill, House bill No. 6243.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair first lays before the Senate its unfinished business, being the bill (S. No. 1382) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] moves that this bill be laid aside temporarily for the purpose stated. The Chair hears no objection.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 6243) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent that the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations be considered as they are reached in the order of reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be the order, if there be no objection.

Mr. MORRILL. Now, may I ask the Senator from Maine to allow me ten minutes to bring up the bill to further regulate the investment of the Pacific Railroad sinking fund. I do not think it will take ten minutes.

Mr. INGALLS. Is it a House bill or Senate bill?

Mr. MORRILL. It is a Senate bill. There is nearly a million dollars now lying idle that ought to be invested and cannot be until this bill is passed.

Mr. HALE. Upon the condition that if it gives rise to debate the Senator will withdraw it, I yield.

Mr. MORRILL. If it takes any time I will withdraw it.

Mr. HALE. I will yield to it for five minutes or ten.

PACIFIC RAILROAD SINKING FUND.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 2090) to further regulate the investment of the Pacific Railroad sinking fund.

Mr. MORRILL. There is about $500,000 received from each of these railroad companies that is now lying idle in the Treasury Department in consequence of the protest on the part of the companies against buying bonds at a high rate of premium, and the bill here presented is one approved by the Finance Committee, having been received from the Secretary of the Treasury, allowing the fund to be converted in the first mortgage bonds of the companies.

I wish to call attention for a moment to the very large amount which the Government has already advanced or pledged itself to pay, amounting to over $40,000,000, for each of these companies, and also to the very surprising statement of the amount that was invested by the Union Pacific since 1879 in the bonds and stocks of other corporations. The amount in 1879 was $7,226,000, while in 1881 they had invested in the bonds and stocks of other corporations $28,705,000. It seems to me very astonishing that the Government of the United States is not to obtain a larger amount of the debt due it from a company that is able in two years to increase its investment in other stocks from $7,000,000 to $28,000,000, but I have no further comment to make upon that.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE. Now, let us go on with the deficiency bill.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6243) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY in the chair.) The amendments of the Committee on Appropriations will be acted on as they are reached in their order, according to the suggestion of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. COCKRELL. I would suggest that where a Senator desires to amend an amendment, that be considered before the amendment is disposed of, and then we shall save the trouble that we had on the other bill.

Mr. HALE. I supposed the order carried that with it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that be the understanding.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the right of any Senator to move to amend an amendment of the committee.

Mr. HALE. I so understand.

The Acting Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment reported from the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "State Department," after line 9, to insert:

For contingent expenses of the Department of State for the fiscal year 1882, $900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 31, after the word "cents," to insert:

Including $300 additional compensation to William S. Gilman for acting as disbursing officer of the commission.

So as to make the clause read

For the additional amount required to carry out the provisions of the joint resolution of February 18, 1881, authorizing and requesting the President to extend to the Government and people of France and the family of General La Fayette an invitation to join the Government and people of the United States in the observance of the centennial anniversary of the surrender of Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown, Virginia, including the expenses of the officer of the War Department detailed to take charge of the military ceremonies at Yorktown, and the liabilities incurred by the Yorktown centennial commission, $32,328.92, including $300 additional compensation to William S. Gilman for acting as disbursing officer of the commission, or so much thereof as may be necessary, payable upon accounts specifically stated, and to be audited and paid by the Secretary of State.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 50, to insert:

For printing and distributing the publications by the Department of State of the consular and other commercial reports, including circular letters to chambers of commerce, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 54, to insert:

For defraying the expenses incurred in the transmission and reception of cable and domestic telegrams by the Department of State and legations abroad owing to the illness and death of the late President, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 58, to insert:

To meet the expenses of the special mission to Peru, Chili, and Bolivia, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "foreign intercourse," after line 76, to insert:

To reimburse the resident commissioners of the United States to the international congress of electricians held in Paris in 1881, $1,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like the Senator from Maine to explain that item and the next one.

Mr. HALE. This was a very important scientific convention held abroad called the international congress of electricians. The United States was represented there by five gentlemen who received letters from the Secretary of State, not in a formal way, but accrediting them to the meeting. They went there and paid their own bills, traveling expenses, and expenses while there, not calling upon the Government at all; but it was a thing of international interest, a subject which everybody is greatly concerned in, and there was a thousand dollars of expense connected with the part that the commissioners there took—not their own expenses, for they were paid out of their own pockets.

Mr. BUTLER. Were they American citizens?

Mr. HALE. Oh, yes. They needed a secretary, and Mr. Philip Walker, who was in the consular service at $4 a day—I will speak of both items now—resigned his place and acted as their secretary, giving his whole time to it, giving up his Government employment, and they ask authority to pay him at the same rate that he was receiving pay in the consular service. That is the next item which appropriates for Philip Walker $2,000. These items were put in the bill in the House of Representatives by the Committee on Appropriations there, but went out on a point of order. The Committee on Appropriations of the Senate on examination believe that while there was no law authorizing any appointment of commissioners to represent the United States and they were not appointed, still it was a subject-matter of national interest, and it was nothing more than fair that this thousand dollars should be paid and the pay of the secretary allowed. That is all there is of it.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator will correct me if I am not right. I understand that application was made to the Government to recognize and authorize participation in an international congress of electricians, and Congress peremptorily and unqualifiedly refused to have anything to do with it. Then these distinguished gentlemen voluntarily got together and held what they pleased to call an international congress, a scientific association, and the gentlemen who went from the United States being gentlemen received letters of introduction to the consuls of the United States and its diplomatic agents abroad. They held their congress, and then they come to the Government to pay their expenses, $1,000, and also to pay a secretary. If we recognize this it is a precedent to pay every voluntary association that may meet in any part of the world. We have had the Pan-Presbyterian assembly, and we have had divers other international conventions and assemblages, and this one has no more right to be compensated in this instance than any other voluntary meeting.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is mistaken as to the commission or these gentlemen being compensated for their expenses. That is not asked for. This is only a thousand dollars that was paid out of their pockets, aside from their expenses, being that portion of necessary expenses assessed upon the American part of the exhibition.

Mr. COCKRELL. Upon the American delegates as citizens, and not as representatives of the United States Government, for they had no authority, directly or indirectly, to represent the Government. They were individual American citizens, and not representatives of the Government.

Mr. HALE. That is just as the Senate sees fit to put it. It was assessed upon the American part of the exhibition, a very interesting and valuable exhibition, which brought out very marked and distinguished features of American ingenuity and enterprise; an exhibition that our citizens traveling abroad were glad and proud to attend, and in the end a thousand dollars was assessed as the American part, and these gentlemen paid it out of their pockets, and if Congress does not see fit to pay it back now, these gentlemen of course will pocket the loss.

There is no claim here to pay their expenses; it is not contended that they represented the Government, because if they had they would have come in for their entire expenses, and instead of $3,000 in all, there would have been here a bill for $25,000. But certainly, considering its importance, that it was not a meeting of a few gentlemen who had got together themselves and hobnobbed together about something uninteresting to the world, considering that it was a matter of great national and international importance, it seems to me clear and plain that we can do no better than to pay this little sum and be glad to get rid of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 80, to insert:

To compensate Philip Walker, late secretary of the commission, for his services, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 101.

Mr. BECK. Lines 98 to 101, inclusive, read:

For freight charges due Adams Express Company, being a deficiency for the year 1880, $11,967.50.

That is a provision which the House inserted in the bill. Is there no deficiency for that express company for 1881 and 1882, and if there is, why are not all the items put in this deficiency bill? My recollection is that the Director of the Mint advised us that there was about $29,000 due to the express companies. If that is the case, I do not see why it is divided into parts.

Mr. ALLISON. I think in the immediate deficiency bill, so called, we provided for a portion of the deficiency.

Mr. BECK. That explains it. I believe we did. That is where I heard the matter come up.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Treasury Department," in the appropriations for "mints and assay offices," in line 105, after the name "Alexander Ramsey," to insert "and S. O. Houghton;" and in line 109, after the word "dollars," to insert "each, and to pay the expenses of Thomas L. Young, also designated by the Secretary of the Treasury for the same purpose, $900; in all, 2,900;" so as to make the clause read:

For compensation of Alexander Ramsey and S. O. Houghton, designated by the Secretary of the Treasury to investigate the management of the United States mint at San Francisco, and expenses connected therewith, $1,000 each, and to pay the expenses of Thomas L. Young, also designated by the Secretary of the Treasury for the same purpose, $900; in all, $2,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 118, to insert:

Five and 6 per cent. bonds:

That section 170 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be so modified that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $9,570, as follows:

For the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, $5,283.14.

For the office of the Register of the Treasury, $1,804.42.

For the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, $482.44, as a reasonable additional compensation to the employés of the Treasury Department who were actually employed during the months of April, May, June, July, and August, 1881, in addition to the usual business hours, on account of the work of continuing, at a lower rate of interest, the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds of 1881; the amount specified above to be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to those actually engaged as aforesaid, in such sums as shall seem to him to be just and equitable, having reference to the value of the services rendered to the Government by each employé, respectively.

For the office of the First Comptroller: for two clerks, at $1,000 each.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like for the Senator who was the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury at that time to give us some reason why these persons should receive this additional and extra compensation over and above their regular salaries.

Mr. WINDOM. When the refunding operations of last summer were in process there was no money to hire any additional clerks. The bonds came in for exchange with such rapidity that it became necessary to work a large force a great part of the night in order to keep up with the demand. I remember that on one day over $30,000,000 of the bonds were returned. The Secretary of the Treasury at that time, not having any funds to employ additional clerks, said to the head of the bureau having charge of the loan division that if the clerks would work at night, out of hours, additional time, he would ask Congress to make a reasonable compensation for that extra night service. The work was done, and done promptly and well, by men who worked during the heat of those months to twelve o'clock midnight and sometimes to two or three o'clock in the morning, and thereby accomplished the work for which there was no appropriation.

I am informed that this estimate is made from keeping an actual account of the hours' work beyond the ordinary time in which the clerks were employed, and that this is compensation merely for the extra number of hours worked by the men, at the regular annual rate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator if we have not heard in the past a good deal about the refunding process costing nothing? I want to know if the Senator himself has not delivered some speech or written some letter claiming great credit for the Republican party that it had reduced the interest upon the bonds from 5 and 6 down to 3½ per cent., and had done it all at no cost to the tax-payers?

Mr. WINDOM. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Missouri. I have made no such speech, nor do I know that anybody else has made any such speech, as he has intimated, but I am under obligations to him for permitting me to state one or two facts.

There were about $700,000,000 of 5 and 6 per cent. bonds refunded at 3½ per cent., and the total cost, including three or four agents sent to Europe, printing and everything else until this amount is asked for, was about $10,000. If the Senator from Missouri can count the infinitesimal per cent. which $10,000 is to $700,000,000 he will know something of the economy with which that work was done. This amendment proposes to add about $9,000, making a total of less than $20,000 for converting $700,000,000 of United States bonds from 5 and 6 per cent. to 3½ per cent.

I will say to the Senator, who says I have made a boast of that, I never have boasted of it, but he affords me the opportunity to do it to-day. I say that the economy of that transaction is something of which I am profoundly proud, and I stand here to confess it in the presence of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understood in some proceedings heretofore occurring that the Senator from Kansas, not now in his seat, referred to some claim of that kind which the Senator had made. I did not say the Senator had made any; I wanted to know; and if the Senator had claimed the credit of having done this at no expense at all, I wanted him to have an opportunity of explaining why this after-clap came in of $9,000 or $10,000. That was all.

Mr. WINDOM. I never have made that claim; but I want to ask the Senator from Missouri if he does not think $20,000 a very moderate expense for converting $700,000,000 of bonds from 5 and 6 per cent. into 3½ per cent.?

Mr. HALE. It is the next thing to nothing, any way.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator has omitted the gas-light and the shoe-leather.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is not a very large amount of money, it is true, but if credit had been claimed before the tax-payers of the country for having done it for nothing, then it would be an extraordinarily large sum. That is the only difference.

Mr. WINDOM. Nobody is foolish enough to say that it was done for nothing.

Mr. COCKRELL. Here is the point in the case: we pay these employés of the Department as a matter of course. I want equal and exact justice done to them; but they are receiving their regular salary and I wanted the Senator to explain what additional work they did beyond the usual hours, and to explain further whether every time an employé in the Treasury Department works a few hours over the seven or eight hours a day he becomes entitled to extra compensation. I wanted that explained so that we might understand it.

Mr. WINDOM. In my opinion he does not become so entitled; but when you ask gentlemen and ladies to work until midnight or later for two or three months in order to accomplish a great public work, it does seem to me that they ought to be paid for it. I ask the Senator from Missouri if he thinks they ought to have done that work for nothing, or is there any private establishment in the country that would have expected such work to have been done for nothing?

Mr. COCKRELL. No; I do not think they ought to have done the work for nothing, but they were receiving a considerable salary at the time. I work a great many nights until much later than twelve o'clock. I ask no additional compensation for it. What I wanted to understand is if the rule is being established in the Departments that every time an employé of the Government works a few hours beyond the designated office-hours he thereby becomes equitably entitled to additional compensation over and above his salary?

Mr. WINDOM. I do not think there is any such rule. I certainly knew of none during the short time I served in that capacity. I want to say to the Senator that if he thinks $10,000 is too much to convert $700,000,000 of bonds he is under not the slightest obligation to pay this sum. Nobody is under any obligation. The Secretary of the Treasury at that time did not commit the Government to it; he simply said to these gentlemen, "I will ask Congress to do it." He did say further, however, that if he remained in office and it was not done he would grant to those men an additional leave of absence in order to compensate them for the work. He is out of office and therefore cannot keep that promise, and he would like to see them paid for that work done out of hours.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 190, to insert:

TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENTS.

For legislative expenses, Territory of Montana, namely: For printing house and council journals of the eleventh regular session of the Legislative Assembly, being for the service of the fiscal year 1879, $1,145.85.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 197, to insert:

For legislative expenses, Territory of Washington, namely: To pay the members and officers of the Legislative Assembly for the extra session from December 2 to December 8, 1881, (six days,) convened by proclamation of the governor of November 28, 1881, $1,194.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "miscellaneous objects," after line 209, to insert:

To pay the Western Union Telegraph Company $114.66, being expenses incurred by the Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service under the provisions of the act of April 29, 1878.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 245, to insert:

To pay the legal representatives of Eben Eveleth, late commissioner of the Court of Claims, for services rendered by said Eveleth and his legal assistant, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 277, to insert:

To pay William H. Johnson an amount sufficient to cover payments made by him to certain supervisors of election in New York City for legal services rendered by the same: Provided, That the amount does not exceed $1,885.

Mr. PENDLETON. I should like to have an explanation of that amendment from the Senator who has charge of the bill.

Mr. HALE. This amendment covers certain small items for supervisors of elections in New York City in 1880. They were small bills running from $5 to $15 and $20. Instead of being presented to the Treasury, they were turned over to William H. Johnson, who paid the parties the money. He brought the accounts all properly vouched and certificated to the Department, and a check was given to him. It was afterward found on their reaching the Comptroller, that the provision of the statute forbidding payments to assignees stood in the way, and Mr. Johnson paid back the money into the Treasury. The object now is to compensate him for the advances that he made to these men, thereby relieving the Treasury.

I will say to the Senator from Ohio that the bills have all been filed and duly certificated. Mr. Johnson is out of his money, and this is simply to repay him what he has paid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 282, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit Francis E. Spinner, late Treasurer of the United States, with the sum of $47,097.65, amount of the deficiency of June 2, 1875, carried to his debit on the books of the Register of the Treasury, per Auditor's report numbered 200,925; and he is further authorized and directed to pay to the Treasurer of the United States, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $650.61, to reimburse said Treasurer for an amount appearing on his books as a deficiency, and konwn as the deficiency of February 18, 1875.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 297, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the State of Kansas 15 per cent. of the amount of her quota of the direct tax of 1861, on account of the proper costs for assuming the collection of the same, $10,761.50.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 303, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to the sureties of C. H. Davis, late postmaster at Vernon Springs, Alabama, the amount collected upon a judgment of court in excess of the actual amount due the United States from said postmaster, as appears of record in the office of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, $731.07.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 311, to insert:

For amount due Enos Richmond for salary and expenses as agent of the late Southern claims commission, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1880, $215.96.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "War Department," in the appropriation for the "Quartermaster's Department," line 360, after the word "paid," to strike out "until a final decision shall be had in respect of each case in dispute;" so as to read:

For the payment of Army transportation lawfully due such land-grant railroads as have not received aid in Government bonds, to be adjusted by the proper accounting officers in accordance with the decisions of the Supreme Court in cases decided under such land-grant acts, but in no case shall more than 50 per cent. of the full amount of the service be paid, $125,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 362, after the word "provided," to strike out:

That such payment shall be accepted as in full of all demands; being for transportation during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That such compensation shall be computed upon the basis of the tariff rates for like transportation performed for the public at large, and shall be accepted as in full for all demands for said services: And provided further, That any such land-grant roads as shall file with the Secretary of the Treasury their written acceptance of this provision shall hereafter be paid for like services as herein provided; and all accounts of such railroads for services heretofore rendered shall be audited and paid as herein provided upon application of such roads and their acceptance of such sum in full of all claims for such services.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 375, to insert:

The Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be paid, out of any unexpended balance of the appropriation for incidental expenses of the Quartermaster's Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, to twenty agents of the Quartermaster's Department employed by Major J. J. Dana, quartermaster, United States Army, the amounts deducted from their salary during the last quarter of said fiscal year, not to exceed $4,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the miscellaneous provisions for the War Department, after line 390, to insert:

For the payment to Demott Bishop, carpenter; N. Mayer, blacksmith; Joseph Valentine, engineer; John T. Carroll, stonemason, and Charles Schmidt, quarryman, employed in the military prison at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, for balance of pay due for the fiscal years 1878 and 1879, $200 each, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 429, after "1883," to strike out "ninety-five" and insert "one hundred and fifteen;" so as to make the clause read:

For payment of amounts for arrears of pay to two and three year volunteers who served in the war of the rebellion, which may be certified to be due by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, up to June 30, 1883, $115,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 441, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "five hundred and fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

For payment of arrears of pay to officers and soldiers of the United States Army which may be certified to be due by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, up to June 30, 1883, $550,000.

Mr. PENDLETON. That proposed appropriation may be all right, and I have no doubt a very satisfactory explanation can be made; but it seems to me the increase is so large that we ought to have it explained.

Mr. HALE. It is a very large increase, and it is an instance of the claims which are constantly being made upon the Treasury by the officers of the Army and Navy in the nature of increase of allowances. Under the law relating to what is known as longevity pay, an officer in the Army and in the Marine Corps adds a percentage of his pay for every five years' service—10 per cent. If he starts at $2,000, in five years the longevity gives him $2,200; in five years more, he gets $200 more; in five years more, $200 more. That has been the theory upon which longevity pay has been estimated.

Some years ago a very ingenious person, whether in the Army or some attorney outside of the Army, conceived the notion that the longevity pay should be compounded; that is, if an officer starting at $2,000 salary in five years gets $200 more, 10 per cent. is added to that, and when he comes to the second five years the 10 per cent. is reckoned, not upon the $2,000, but upon the $2,200, thus compounding the longevity pay. The accounting officer of the Treasury resisted it, of course, and the matter was carried into the court. It was decided against the Government, and the Treasury finds itself now confronted with this new demand that it has got to pay.

Mr. MORGAN. What court was it carried into?

Mr. HALE. The Supreme Court, in the famous Tyler case. The claims are coming in. I will say to the Senator from Ohio and to the Senate that the committee has put in an additional $525,000, but that is not going to pay all. When these claims have all come in they will aggregate perhaps considerably more than a million dollars to come out of the Treasury.

This is a thing which can be cured for the future, and that has already been done, because upon the Army appropriation bill the Appropriations Committee reported a clause providing in terms as distinct as the ingenuity of the committee could make it, with a hope that there might be some possibility of holding these officers to a rule such as everybody else besides them understands with reference to their pay. It may be a hopeless task, but that has been attempted and it has been cured so far as it can be. That is the reason why this appropriation is proposed.

Mr. DAWES. The law is altered now.

Mr. HALE. Yes, the law is altered now by statute, but this is a claim which cannot be avoided. It is a claim which has passed through the courts, and has been submitted to a final adjudication, and they are entitled to it and get their pay.

Mr. MAXEY. Has it been corrected so as to bring it back to what was evidently the original purpose, to add the percentage only on the starting pay? Is there any statute that makes it right now?

Mr. HALE. I have endeavored to show that this has been cured, so that hereafter the 10 per cent. will be reckoned upon the original starting pay.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It was so provided in the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. Which has already passed and become a law. I made a reckoning in a certain case that in a single year it made a difference of over $400. Senators can easily see how soon it will roll up to a million dollars when applied to the Army.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 441, to insert:

For payment of amounts for additional bounty under the act of July 28, 1866, which may be certified to be due by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department up to June 30, 1883, $80,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Navy Department," in line 462, to reduce the appropriation "for the Bureau of Construction and Repair" from $150,000 to $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 475, to insert:

For accrued mileage to naval officers and officers of the Marine Corps under the act approved June 30, 1876, in accordance with the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the United States vs. Temple, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 480, to insert:

For accrued longevity pay of officers of the Marine Corps, in accordance with the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the United States vs. Tyler, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Interior Department," in the appropriations for the "public land service," after line 556, to insert:

For salaries and commissions of registers and receivers of district land offices for the fiscal year 1882, $25,481.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 560, to insert:

For the payment to the heirs of E. G. Moore, deceased, late register of the land office at Lecompton, Kansas, for fees and commissions due him for the calendar year 1859, as per letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office of date of May, 1881, $423.61.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "Indian affairs," line 625, after the words "support of," to strike out "Hualapai Apaches in Arizona," and insert "Mojave Indians;" so as to read:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay indebtedness incurred under "support of Apaches of Arizona and New Mexico," "support of Mojave Indians," "support of Arrapahoes, Cheyennes, Apaches, Kiowas, Comanches, and Wichitas," "telegraphing and purchase of Indian supplies," and "transportation of Indian supplies," for the fiscal year 1881, $94,387.56, (of which sum $61,313.61 is appropriated to readjust balances, and involves no expenditure of money from the Treasury.)

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 640, to strike out:

To pay to John R. Baylor amount of certificate numbered 5830, due him as special Indian agent, "for 1879 and prior years," as per House Executive Document No. 202, Forty-seventh Congress, first session, $417.25.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] desires that those words shall be retained. The Senator from Texas is absent in attendance on the Committee on Commerce, which is sitting by special permission of the Senate, and I ask that the amendment be passed over until he comes in.

Mr. MAXEY. I have been here waiting for this item to be reached. I desire some explanation in regard to it.

Mr. HALE. The clause was stricken out because the item is included in the provision found on pages 71 and 72.

Mr. MAXEY. So that Mr. Baylor will get his money under another part of the bill?

Mr. HALE. Under another clause.

Mr. MAXEY. Then it is all right.

Mr. BECK. I was not aware that the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] took an interest in the matter, but his colleague spoke to me and said he hoped it would not be acted on in his absence.

Mr. MAXEY. I did not wish the amendment agreed to, but the explanation made by the Senator in charge of the bill explains it, and it is all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky withdraws his request to have the amendment passed over.

Mr. BECK. I withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, after line 735, to insert:

To pay the expenses of the Ute commission provided for under section 2 of the act of June 15, 1880, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 738, to insert:

To pay expenses of the board of Indian commissioners, namely: For salary of the secretary, $2,000; for salary of messenger, $600; for rent of office, $400; for contingent expenses of office, $200; and for traveling expenses of members, $700; in all, $3,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 745, to insert:

To pay James L. Henry, of Asheville, North Carolina, for services as attorney in behalf of the North Carolina Cherokee Indians, in the case of Polly Tatham, administratrix of Thomas C. Tatham, deceased, against the Eastern Band of Cherokee Indians of North Carolina, $150, to be paid out of any funds in the Treasury belonging to said Indians.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Post-Office Department," after line 826, to insert:

To pay in full for transferring the foreign mails through the city of Chicago from November 1, 1879, to June 30, 1883, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. It is desired to have an executive session, and I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

THE BANKRUPTCY SYSTEM.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will first lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 1382) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States. That bill being pending the Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of exective business. After thirty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and forty-eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 1, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

INDIAN RESERVATION IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. HASKELL, by unanimous consent, reported back with amendments, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, the bill (S. No. 1255) to provide for the sale of a part of the reservation of the Omaha tribe of Indians in the State of Nebraska, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CONTESTED ELECTION—SMITH VS. SHELLEY.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I desire to present the views of a minority of the Committee on Elections in the contested-election case of Smith vs. Shelley, from the fourth district of Alabama. I ask that the views of the minority be printed with the report.

The SPEAKER. It will be so ordered.

ISSUE OF 2 PER CENT. GOVERNMENT BONDS.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read. I will state briefly that it was prepared under the auspices of the Secretary of the Treasury and is approved by the Committee on Ways and Means. It provides for the emission of $200,000,000 of 2 per cent. bonds or certificates in exchange for the 3½ per cent. bonds now outstanding.

Mr. MILLS. At what time will these bonds be redeemable?

Mr. KELLEY. Redeemable all the time after the 3½ per cent. bonds have been called. That is the advantage which the takers of these bonds will receive. The joint resolution expresses clearly the retention of the Government option.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue 2 per cent. bonds or certificates in exchange for bonds bearing a higher rate of interest.

Be it resolved, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered in his discretion to issue bonds or certificates of indebtedness of the United States in such form, being $50 or multiples of that sum, as he shall see fit, to the amount of not more in the aggregate than $200,000,000, bearing interest at the rate of 2 per cent. per annum, payable half yearly, and the principal and accrued interest payable at any time at the option of the United States. He shall issue them only in exchange for the obligations of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest than 2 per cent. per annum, and at the par value of the several obligations exchanged. The bonds or certificates of indebtedness hereby authorized shall not be redeemed until all the bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest, and which are also payable at the option of the Government, shall have first been paid off or called. The bonds or certificates hereby authorized shall be called in for payment in the inverse order to that in which they shall have been issued and in such sum at each call as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine. They may be used by the national banking associations as security for the payment and redemption of their circulating notes, and by national-bank depositories as security for deposits with them of public moneys at the same rates and subject to the same regulations as other obligations of the Government are now received and held for those purposes respectively. They shall be redeemable at the Treasury of the United States in coin of the present standard value; and the interest thereon shall be payable in that coin at that place. They shall be exempt from all taxes or duties of the United States, and from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority. Nothing herein contained shall be held or construed to authorize any increase whatever of the bonded debt of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this joint resolution?

Mr. HASELTINE. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire whether the proper interpretation of this measure is that the payment of these 2 per cent. bonds is only postponed until after the payment of the extended fives and sixes.

Mr. KELLEY. Exactly.

Mr. HOLMAN. No further?

Mr. KELLEY. No further; and they are subject to call any time when those shall have been paid.

Mr. RANDALL. The probability is that the owners of the extended 5 per cent. bonds would be the purchasers of these bonds.

Mr. KELLEY. That is possible.

Mr. RANDALL. There are no other bonds (except, I think, about $30,000,000 of 6 per cent. bonds) which have been extended at 3½ per cent.; and there is likely to be very soon a call of $15,000,000 of that part of the indebtedness. So that the great bulk of these 2 per cent. bonds would be taken by the present holders of 5 percents extended at 3½.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think that if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HASELTINE] understood this joint resolution he would make no objection to it. It does not postpone the payment of the debt one hour, but simply reduces the rate of interest, in cases where the holder may consent to it, to 2 per cent. There ought not to be any objection to the measure. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri insist on his objection?

Mr. HASELTINE. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. KELLEY. I implore the gentleman to withdraw his objection. Why should we pay 3½ per cent. interest on $200,000,000 when we are solicited to accept that amount at 2 per cent.?

Mr. HASELTINE. I object to considering a measure of this importance without proper opportunity for examination and discussion.

Mr. DINGLEY. Let it come before the House, then, for consideration.

Mr. KELLEY. I have only asked that it come before the House for consideration. If the gentleman has any objection to urge, he will have the fullest opportunity. [Cries of "Regular order."] I trust the regular order will not be called. This is a very important measure.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. MILLS. Who objected to the consideration of the joint resolution?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HASELTINE.]

CORRECTION OF ENROLLMENT.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on War Claims a joint resolution (H. R. No. 249) amending a paragraph in the act for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department, approved May 1, 1882, and to correct an error in the enrollment thereof; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the immediate consideration of this resolution.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the following paragraph in the act for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department, approved May 1, 1882, "to Fred. Henninger, surviving partner of Henninger & Gillaspie, of Franklin County, $80," be amended to read as follows, namely, "to Fred. Henninger, surviving partner of Henninger & Gillaspie, of Franklin County, $46."

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that a letter from the Secretary be read to show the basis upon which this joint resolution is founded.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 15, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to invite the attention of Congress to the inclosed copy of a statement from the Third Auditor of the Treasury, of the 13th instant, in regard to the appropriation made to Fred. Henninger, surviving partner of Henninger & Gillaspie, of Franklin County, Pennsylvania, on page 16 of private act No. 49, approved May 1, 1882, providing for the payment of certain claims allowed under the act of July 4, 1864.

From the statement of the Auditor it appears that the claimant demanded only $46; that the vouchers on which he based the claim called for only that sum, and that the accounting officers allowed and reported only that sum; yet the sum of $80 is appropriated to Mr. Henninger in the act referred to.

There is nothing in the papers in the case as they were returned to this Department from Congress which could suggest an allowance of a higher amount than $46, and the presumption is, therefore, that the increased allowance resulted from clerical error.

The papers are herewith returned to Congress for such action as may be deemed necessary in the case.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. J. FOLGER, Secretary.

Hon. J. W. KEIFER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DONATION OF MILITARY LANDS FOR SCHOOL PURPOSES.

Mr. PACHECO. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 77) to donate certain military lands and possessions in the county of Inyo, State of California, for school purposes for present consideration. It is in the interest of education, and I hope there will be no objection to it.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to convey to the counties of Inyo and Mono, State of California, through a board of trustees hereinafter provided for, for the purpose of creating, establishing, and maintaining a high school, all those certain pieces, parcels, and tracts of land known as Camp Independence, situate, lying, and being in the county of Inyo and State aforesaid, described as follows, namely: The east half of lot number one of the northeast quarter of section number one, in township number thirteen south, range number thirty-four east, and the fractional west half of lot number one of the northwest quarter of section number six, in township number thirteen south, range number thirty-five east, base and meridian of Mount Diablo, containing about eighty acres, together with all the improvements thereon, rights, tenements, hereditaments, and appurtenances thereunto belonging.

SEC. 2. That said property so conveyed shall not be sold, assigned, nor converted by the said counties of Inyo and Mono, or either of them, for any other purpose than the one contemplated by this act: Provided, That said school and property shall be managed and controlled for the purposes herein contemplated by a board of trustees, consisting of three resident tax-payers of the county of Inyo, and two resident tax-payers of the county of Mono, who shall be appointed as follows, namely: three by the board of supervisors of said Inyo County and two by the board of supervisors of said Mono County: And provided, That said board of trustees shall be appointed by said boards of supervisors of the respective counties at their second meeting after the approval of this act; the said board of trustees to hold their offices for the term of three years from the 1st day of January succeeding their appointment, and until their successors are appointed: And provided further, That the Secretary of War shall require of each of said counties, by resolution, and by the appointment of such trustees by their respective boards of supervisors, an acceptance and agreement to the conditions of this act before making the conveyance herein provided; and he shall make such resolution of acceptance and a duly certified transcript of such agreement a part of his deed of conveyance.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to transfer the remainder of the Camp Independence military reservation to the Secretary of the Interior, for disposition under the provisions of the general land laws: Provided, however, That the present settlers upon such lands shall be recognized as entitled to the first right of entry.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the right to object until some explanation has been made of this bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. This will lead to discussion, and I must object.

Mr. HASELTINE. I withdraw my objection to the proposition reported from the Ways and Means Committee by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I must object to the bill of the gentleman from California until we have some time to look into it. It is an important measure and should not pass without full consideration.

FUNDING—JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. HASELTINE. I withdraw my objection to the consideration of the funding proposition reported from the Ways and Means Committee by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. HISCOCK. I must demand the regular order of business.

Mr. KELLEY. I hope not, as against the joint resolution I have reported.

Mr. HISCOCK. What will come before the House if I withdraw my objection?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania again on the funding proposition.

Mr. CANNON. How much time will it take?

Mr. KELLEY. If it provokes debate I will withdraw it. I ask its passage by unanimous consent.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understand from the gentleman in charge of the appropriation bill that the gentleman from Pennsylvania says if his proposition provokes discussion he will withdraw it.

Mr. KELLEY. Certainly.

Mr. HISCOCK. With that understanding I withdraw my demand for the regular order.

Mr. KELLEY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported joint resolution (H. R. No. 250) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue 2 per cent. bonds or certificates in exchange for bonds bearing a higher rate of interest; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let the report be read.

The SPEAKER. There is no report accompanying the joint resolution.

Mr. KELLEY. This is a joint resolution reducing interest on bonds from 3½ to 2 per cent. without extending the time.

The joint resolution was again read.

Mr. ATKINS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question. Is it the purpose of this joint resolution to extend any of these bonds beyond 1907?

Mr. KELLEY. Not beyond the three-and-a-halfs. They are to be called immediately on the expiration of the time.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

DUTIES ON RAW WOOLS.

Mr. RUSSELL. I ask that by unanimous consent a petition relating to duties on raw wools be referred to the Ways and Means Committee, and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the petition will be referred to the Ways and Means Committee, and the body, without the names, printed in the RECORD.

The body of the petition is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

We, the operatives of the Shaw Stocking Company, of Lowell, Massachusetts, engaged in the manufacture of knit goods, earnestly appeal to Congress for the immediate correction of the error in the Revised Statutes by which knit goods are made subject to a much lower duty than the pound duties on raw wools, as we believe that this error, if it remains uncorrected, must of necessity throw thousands of us out of employment in our American mills for the manufacture of knit goods.

LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

Mr. COBB. I ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri to a privileged report.

Mr. BRAGG. I wish to notify gentlemen who want cannon-balls that this is the last chance they will have.

Mr. ROBESON. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. VAN HORN. I rise to make a privileged report. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back House resolution No. 174, for printing the report of the Life-Saving Service, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That there be printed 10,000 copies of the report of the operations of the United States Life-Saving Service for the year ending June 30, 1881, including the instructions to mariners in case of shipwreck, and the tables showing the location of stations, but without the other accompanying tables, for distribution among the officers of our merchant marine, through the collectors of customs, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, the House, if not the country, is aware of the deep interest I feel in every laudable effort to make "life saving" a practical reality. This bill introduced by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. VAN HORN] is a part of that system which provides for this humane service. Since Louisville has championed the re-enforcement of the system through her indefatigable member, [Mr. WILLIS;] since Kentucky has been thrilled by the recent successful effort at her "falls," where many precious lives were saved by the efforts of the crew at her new station; since, though "inland far we be," in making this service beautiful and useful, it is not wonderful that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. VAN HORN] should demonstrate his kindly interest, the time may come when the inland waters which he so vigilantly represents may have the benefit of this benignant system. I hail, therefore, "my cousin of Buckingham," for we are connected through this noble family, as a co-worker in this grand endeavor in behalf of the imperiled. The gentleman [Mr. VAN HORN] has asked me to second his graceful effort for this additional measure for the Life-Saving Service. This I will gladly do.

I ask to state the reasons for the publication of an edition of the Life-Saving report for distribution among merchant marine. The principal reason for having an edition of the annual report of the Life-Saving Service for distribution among mariners is that the report educates them in the methods of co-operation with the life-saving crews in case of disaster. In many instances the life-saving crews have had considerable trouble in effecting rescues, owing to the ignorance of the sailors on board, who did not know what to do, either when the life-saving boat came up alongside or when life-lines were sent on board through the instrumentality of the wreck-gun. For example, at the stranding of the Nuova Ottavia on the coast of North Carolina in 1876, a number of lives were lost owing to the precipitate manner in which the sailors endeavored to enter the surf-boat as it came up under the bulwarks, the boat in this instance being capsized by the rush, and the entire life-saving crew and nine of the mariners being sacrificed.

At the stranding of the C. E. Trumbull in 1880, a failure to co-operate with the life-saving crew, by cutting the vessel's main sheet and letting the boom swing forward, was the cause of a disaster which cost the lives of three of the life-saving crew, the boom being in the path of the boat's only practicable approach, and finally striking and capsizing her. In a number of instances where rescues were to be effected by the life-car or breeches-buoy, delay and obstruction were created by the sailors not handling properly the lines got to them through the agency of the wreck-gun. In some cases the hawser and hauling-lines have been attached too low on board the vessel, so that the persons to be rescued were subject to perilous immersion on their shoreward passage, or to the wash of the seas. In other cases the lines have been simply allowed to lie across the vessel's deck unused, through ignorance of what was to be done with them.

In one instance, that of a Norwegian vessel, the shot-line fell across the vessel's deck and was allowed to lie there for hours, no amount of gesticulation or pantomime from the surfmen on shore being sufficient for all that time to make the sailors comprehend that they were to haul in the line, and by so doing drag the hauling-lines on board, which was the initial condition of their deliverance. It has been found that the remedy for these evils is in the dissemination among mariners of the peculiar information contained in the life-saving reports. Sea-faring men reading the accounts of the operations of rescues, such as those found, for example, between pages 19 and 76 of the report for 1881, or of the services of life-saving crews, between pages 98 and 199, become acquainted with the methods employed by the service for saving them in case of disaster, and learn what they can do in co-operation with the life-saving crews to assist or facilitate rescue.

To make them still more proficient in these methods, a specific manual of instructions to mariners how to co-operate with the life-saving crews in case of shipwreck has been published as a section of the last annual report. (See page 233.) The information contained on these points in the reports has been found so important that in a number of instances demand has been made by the collectors of customs, through whom in former years they have been distributed, for an increased supply, and their effect has been shown in a steady decrease of the inaptitude or ignorance on the part of shipmasters, which the service in past years had frequent reason to deplore.

The reports generally afford shipmasters the fullest information of every kind respecting the Life-Saving Service, showing the location by latitude and longitude of the stations, the nature of their equipments with reference to the character of the aid they are prepared to render, the fact that this aid will be rendered without expense to them, and, in a word, all that they need to know in regard to the establishment, besides the particular directions given how to comport themselves in the event of marine disaster.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VAN HORN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIST OF MERCHANT VESSELS.

Mr. VAN HORN also, from the Committee on Printing, reported back the following Senate resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, &c., That 1,000 additional copies of the list of merchant vessels, published under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, for 1881, be printed for the use of the Department of State.

Mr. VAN HORN moved to reconsider the votes by which the several resolutions reported from the Committee on Printing were agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS, UNITED STATES.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back, as a substitute for the resolution of Mr. BUCKNER, of the 26th of June, the following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform this House as to the number of public buildings authorized to be erected since December 1, 1865, outside the District of Columbia, the place where said public buildings are located, the cost of construction and furnishing the same, the Government officers accommodated by said buildings, including United States courts, the rent, cost of repairs, &c., paid by the Government for the use of its officers and the courts of the United States prior to the construction and occupancy of said buildings, and the cost to the Government of preserving and keeping in order each of said buildings.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if this resolution provides also for the dates of the acts authorizing the construction of these public buildings.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The object of the amended resolution was to embrace all of these points.

Mr. RANDALL. Because if it does not I would like to have that done.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I think it is already included in the resolution. This covers all acts for the construction of public buildings since 1865.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to the far-reaching character of the resolution with respect to the dates covered by it, but I think the point to which I have alluded should be incorporated in it, and I hope the gentleman will not object to it if it is not already embodied in the resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. The date of the act authorizing these structures will be quite important.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not object I would like to move that as an amendment.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I think from the wording of the resolution as read it will be seen perhaps that that point is embraced in it, but I have no objection to its being made more specific if desired——

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that while the resolution covers the information with reference to these buildings, their cost, &c., extending back as far as 1865, yet that it does not specifically provide for the dates of the several acts authorizing their construction.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I would ask the gentleman to allow such an amendment to be offered as will include that information.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. There can be no possible objection to that, as it was contemplated in the resolution, if not directly expressed. The object of the resolution is to give the full history of these buildings, which, of course, embraces the dates of the acts authorizing their construction.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I offer the following amendment:

Insert, after the words "District of Columbia," the words "the dates of the several acts authorizing the same respectively."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania include in this resolution the amount originally appropriated by the act authorizing the construction of the buildings, and then the additional expense which has been incurred subsequently? For instance, some of these buildings had originally a few hundred thousand dollars appropriated for them, and many have gone up into the millions before they were completed.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I am not authorized by the committee to make any amendment of that character. But the resolution as reported seems to cover all necessary information.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I would like to have the resolution amended so as to show what the original act called for, and the amounts finally expended before the buildings were completed.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. That seems to be covered by the language of the resolution which gives the full history of each one of these structures.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that the information to which he refers can be obtained from the reports of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I am aware of that; and we can also get the same information by going through a dozen or more of the volumes of the statutes here; but while you are aggregating this information, it seems that it would be just as well to cover all these points. This one is a matter of importance. I wish the resolution also to be so broad in its character as to know how much the Government is paying for the cost of taking care of each one of these buildings, for janitors, &c.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I do not quite gather from the statement of the gentleman exactly the point to which he refers, but the proposition of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was to so amend the resolution of the gentleman from Missouri as to broaden the field of inquiry, going back to the year 1865 and giving a complete history of the public buildings authorized since that date. This proposes also to ask information as to the cost of keeping said buildings in repair, furnishing, heating, &c., the uses to which said buildings have been put, and also the amount of rent paid by the Government prior to the act authorizing the construction of the buildings, with other points connected necessarily therewith. So that I think the gentleman from Kentucky will find the resolution is sufficiently broad to give all the information which will be of positive use to the House and the committee.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. A very important item of cost in connection with these buildings is that of keeping them in order—watchmen, janitors, &c. I hope the resolution will be sufficiently broad to cover all the facts of importance in connection with this matter.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ROBESON. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees.

Mr. STEPHENS. I hope the House will not agree to dispense with the morning hour. Several committees here have reports which they are ready to make and which can be placed before the House in a few moments.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 78, noes 12.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the morning hour was dispensed with.

Mr. ROBESON. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the unfinished business; and pending that motion I will yield to gentlemen to submit certain reports from committees.

JAMES I. WADDELL.

Mr. REED, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill (H. R. No. 6689) to remove the political disabilities of James I. Waddell; which was read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. What disposition does the gentleman desire made of the bill?

Mr. REED. If it is in order I would like to have the bill passed now, as it is one of the last bills of the kind undisposed of.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the political disabilities imposed upon James I. Waddell by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States be, and the same are hereby, removed.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. REED moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PATRICK HORAN.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 6501) granting a pension to Patrick Horan; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KASSON. I am instructed unanimously by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to ask consent that a bill be now taken from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and considered at this time. It is a bill of but seven lines and it is deemed important on both sides of the House that it should pass at this session. If it does not give rise to any debate I will ask that it be now considered; if it does I will not press it.

Mr. PAGE. I have been waiting to submit some reports. I thought the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] yielded to allow reports to be presented.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct; he will be recognized to submit his reports at this time.

ESTABLISHMENT OF LIGHT-HOUSES.

Mr. PAGE, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back the following; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 6267) making an appropriation for the purpose of establishing a light-house at or near South Pass, Vermillion Bay, Louisiana, with amendments;

A bill (H. R. No. 6373) to establish a light-house at the entrance of Gray's Harbor, Washington Territory; and

A bill (H. R. No. 6374) to establish a first order light-house and fog-signal on Destruction Island, Washington Territory.

DUTIES ON SUGAR IN BOND.

Mr. KASSON. I now ask consent to call up for consideration at this time the bill (H. R. No. 2222) to amend section 2983 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so that the duties paid upon sugars shall be assessed upon the quantity delivered from instead of the quantity entered into bonded warehouses.

Mr. BRAGG. I reserve my right to object until the bill is read.

Mr. KASSON. That is right.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 2983 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following:

"Provided, That the duties on imported sugars deposited in any bonded warehouse established under authority of law shall be assessed upon the quantity delivered from the warehouse instead of the quantity entered into the warehouse."

Mr. KASSON. I will say that the simple point of the bill is this: owing to the payment of duties on shrinkage——

Mr. BRAGG. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the bill is not before the House.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and a joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 6225) to authorize the changing of alley-ways in the city of Washington; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 224) accepting the offer of Dr. H. D. Coggswell, of San Francisco, California, to donate to the Government of the United States an ornamental drinking-fountain, to be erected at his cost in the city of Washington.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ROBESON. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of further considering the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. PAGE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of further considering the bill (H. R. No. 6616) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes. The pending question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. CALKINS,] to strike out what the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That hereafter all promotions to the grade of rear-admiral on the active list shall be made by selection from the grades of commodore and captain, and no more promotions to the grade of commodore shall be made: Provided, however, That no commodore now in the service shall be reduced in rank or deprived of his commission by reason of this act: And provided further, That when a vacancy in the grade of rear-admiral shall occur in time of peace, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to convene a board of three officers not below the grade of rear-admiral, who shall select the names of five officers not below the grade of captain, one of whom shall be nominated by the President to fill said vacancy.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon this amendment the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] is entitled to the floor for two minutes.

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose on the day before yesterday I had the floor on the question of dispensing with the office of commodore. I had shown, I think, that in seeking the reduction of this grade we are seeking the reduction of a grade which is without utility to the service. Another reason is that under the operation of our present laws nobody goes upon the retired list of the Navy until he gets to be a rear-admiral by age. The result is that we have to-day forty-eight rear-admirals upon the retired list; and I understand that another goes upon that list to-day, making forty-nine. Now, in the service of most of the European nations men go upon the retired list at lower rank, because they are not promoted in regular succession as they are here. Men who are ordered to duty by selection and are chosen with a view to the effectiveness of the service are promoted, while those who are of no use to the service reach the age for retirement before they are promoted. All along the line in the English service you see retired lieutenants, retired commanders, retired captains, making the retired list of that great service hardly more expensive than our own.

Under our system no one is retired until he has gone through all the grades of the service, carrying with him to the retired list the highest pay known to the law. The result is that the whole expenditure for the retired list is paid to officers of the highest rank.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DEZENDORF. I am opposed to the pending provision of this bill, because it blots from the Naval Register a rank which has from time immemorial shed a halo of glory over the service. From the days of John Paul Jones down to the time when Farragut, lashed in the rigging, passed the forts at New Orleans this rank, although, as the gentleman from New Jersey says, held by courtesy, has been a rank conferred by the people; and a rank which, as I have just said, has shed a halo of glory over the service. If this is a rank held by courtesy, I feel about it as "Old Abe" did about Grant's whisky: I wish there was more of just such courtesy in the service.

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] says that these men are too big for a ship and too small for a squadron. But, Mr. Chairman, they have always been big enough to win the victories in any battle in which they have been engaged. I am opposed to this proposed change, because to-day this rank is held by law, and these sections do injustice to commodores who now hold rank by law in permitting junior officers to be promoted over them.

I am also opposed to the provision because it does injustice to captains. There are now upon the retired list five captains who are heroes of two wars, who are now just about at that time of life and at that grade in the service when they have the right to expect promotion; and this cuts them off from that promotion.

I am opposed to the provision because it calls for nominations by selection, which means nominations by favoritism, and not by seniority. I am in favor of promotions by seniority because they are an incentive to ambition and the faithful discharge of duty. Promotions by selection are calculated to break down the esprit du corps of the Navy. I hope, therefore, that these sections will be stricken from the bill.

Mr. ROBESON. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. KNOTT. I renew it. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] that our present system of promotions in the Navy has its inconveniences, not to say its hardships. It is inconvenient, perhaps, to some aspiring young captain who stands near the lower end of the list, and who carries such a superabundance of talent and energy that his scull is perhaps liable to explode if he waits upon the slow processes of "anno Domini." It is a hardship, too, upon the political parasite that infests the skirts of authority and "crooks the pregnant hinges of the knee, that thrift may follow fawning."

It is a hardship, too, perhaps to some who might be good officers in time were it not for those vile guns and whose only commendation is to be found in the princely patrimony lavished in sumptuous feasts to those upon whose shoulders they would climb into place and power.

To relieve these hardships resting upon all these classes the bill as it now stands is admirably adapted. All that is to be done is for the Secretary of the Navy in the first place to be manipulated to select carefully three retired rear-admirals and to indicate to them a list of five captains from whom the vacancy is to be filled. When that selection is made it is very easy, with the confidential relations existing between the Cabinet minister and the President, for the particular favorite to be indicated.

While these hardships might be relieved by passing the bill as it now stands, I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that greater evils may possibly result from this system of promotion than from that which is carried out by the kind offices of old "anno Domini."

Therefore, sir, I think it wisdom "to bear the ills we have, than fly to others that we know not of." I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana will prevail, and this whole proviso will be stricken out.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I have the same trouble I had when I made a suggestion on a former day in reference to the provision which restricts the President in his appointments to the concurrence of a board to be selected by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. ROBESON. I have no objection to a separate vote on that.

Mr. HISCOCK. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts concede the right of Congress to make any such provision?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I do not concede it.

Mr. ROBESON. I am willing to have a separate vote on that.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. And I shall ask to have a separate vote on that provision. I did not have the good fortune to hear the remarks on that proposition the other day. The President, we all know, has the right to nominate, and, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint officers of the United States including the military, naval, and civil service as well. There is no limitation on that power.

Mr. HISCOCK. Does the gentleman claim there is no limitation now?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I am going to come to that. Let me state it. Congress has the right, under the Constitution, to raise armies and establish a navy, and next to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces. That is all. Now, within that third line, the regulation and government of the land and naval forces, Congress may legislate, but not outside, if I understand it properly. Therefore, if this Congress has the right to say that the President shall be confined in his selection to the action of a board selected by the Secretary of the Navy who may present the names of five men, we may, of course, in the same line say that board may present the name of one man whom the President shall select or appoint. In other words, by law you provide that a board, not appointed by the President, but appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, may suggest to him the name of a person whom he shall appoint.

Mr. BLOUNT. I should like to ask my friend from Massachusetts what the mode of promotion now is as he understands it?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Now, that does not meet the difficulty by saying they have another one at the present time. Let us work this from the foundation; that is the most proper and logical way. If it is wrong, it does not make it right by finding some one else in error. We find other statutes authorizing provisions for boards, but they are boards to examine into the physical and mental qualifications of the different persons. I apprehend that might fairly come within the power of Congress to adopt rules for the regulation and government of the land and naval forces; that is to say, it would be entirely competent for Congress to provide a method to determine whether different persons are physically and mentally qualified at all to do the duty they will be required to perform. It seems to me that is an entirely different field of investigation.

But this does not propose that at all. It says, in so many words, to the President, "Instead of your having the right to select, we will put upon you a board that shall confine you just to five men."

Now, to illustrate it, and to emphasize it, I say you might as well by law make it one man as the result of that selection, and if you can, then of course the President is set one side entirely.

Mr. TALBOTT. Let me make a suggestion to the gentleman from Massachusetts. Is not this board obliged under the law to act in conjunction with the other board to inquire into the physical and mental qualifications of the applicants for promotion?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. My answer to that is, this proposes to go much further than that. It does not stop at that point. It says the President shall be bound by their determination as to whom he appoints, merely as a matter of personal preference if you please. In other words, the Secretary of the Navy may make the rear-admiral. That is all it amounts to. The Secretary of the Navy may select his own board, and that board, under the Secretary of the Navy, may make the admiral. The President simply registers the decree. I do not believe that is in the power of Congress.

Mr. TALBOTT. I do not think the gentleman from Massachusetts understands my question. In your judgment would not this board of three have to act in conjunction with the board which would have to inquire into the mental and physical condition of officers making application?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I did not understand the gentleman. There is nothing in this act which requires them to do so. Therefore I think they might well go alone.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will take the floor and yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I have said all I wish to.

Mr. KNOTT. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. I renew it.

I wish to confine myself, Mr. Chairman, in what I have to say to the feature of this bill which reduces the number of the line of the Navy, rather than to this clause which provides for the promotion of certain officers. There are two propositions there; and it is to the reduction feature that I shall address myself at this time.

We have been told here upon the floor during this debate that this grade of commodore is a time-honored grade; and that we are almost sacrilegious, absolutely impious, when we attempt to strike it down and remove it from the service. Why, Mr. Chairman, that grade in our Navy was created in the year 1862, when nearly two years of the war had been fought. The war had actually begun and had been going on for that time before it was dreamed of creating it at all. The balance of the war was fought with only eighteen of these commodores, and that was the whole number then deemed necessary. After the close of the war the number was increased to twenty-five; and gentlemen here would seem to think that we were taking these officers absolutely from their ships and retiring them from the service. The inference might be drawn from what has been said on this subject that these officers are actually in command somewhere, and discharging their duties upon the sea.

Now I desire, sir, briefly to call the attention of the committee to the facts in connection with this matter, and to show what I believe to be indisputable, that this whole force of commodores, without a single exception, is to-day employed upon shore duty, and not one of them is in command of a vessel. In the first place, we do not propose to displace any of these men. We propose to allow them to continue in the discharge of their duties. But we find the Navy absolutely top-heavy. In 1862, when the Navy was upon a war footing, we only had thirty-six captains. At the close of the war we increased it to fifty. We had seventy-two commanders at the close of the war and increased them to ninety, and we had one hundred and forty-four lieutenants, which number we have increased on a peace footing to two hundred and eighty. Now, the reason why all this is done was for the purpose of affording to meritorious officers in the volunteer service of the Navy additional rank. It was done for the purpose of the promotion of meritorious officers who had won distinction in the Navy, and it was done as a reward of merit, a recognition of services. Eighteen years have elapsed since they won their promotions, and I would do nothing to remove the honor or distinguishing rank which has been placed upon these men. But a new generation has come in.

In these piping times of peace we do not need the services of these officers. We do not need to expend the money upon the line and staff of the Navy. We need to expend what we can expend in that direction upon ships for the Navy. That is the policy of this bill.

Again, Mr. Chairman, there are to-day one hundred and thirty men upon the retired list of the Navy from the line and one hundred and thirty-two from the staff, and to-day we have a retired list that is costing us $697,925.

The question then is whether we shall go on accumulating or increasing this retired list and adding year by year to this expenditure?

The point for our consideration is whether we shall maintain this large Navy establishment to-day, one-half of which is really and in effect a peace establishment?

I have these figures which have been furnished me by the Navy Department, and to which I desire to call attention. We have to-day of commissioned officers six hundred and forty at sea, and that is all. We have four hundred and eighty on shore duty.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON took the floor and yielded to Mr. HISCOCK.

Mr. HISCOCK. We have one hundred and forty-two officers on waiting orders in addition to that, and, as I have said, four hundred and eighty upon shore duty—duties that they can properly discharge, but the duty, Mr. Chairman, that is performed by them could be performed by one-half the number——

Mr. CANNON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I want to see if I understand the gentleman correctly. This bill does not propose to interfere with those worthy people who have been promoted in the service?

Mr. HISCOCK. Not at all.

Mr. CANNON. But after taking care of them, it then, as I understand it, in a time of peace proposes that all of these men who never saw war shall not be allowed to be the beneficiaries of the Government and of its liberality, which was designed for those who won promotion in time of war.

Mr. HISCOCK. This bill simply contemplates, Mr. Chairman, that the men who have been promoted in the Navy for distinguished service, or for long service, shall continue in the rank they now hold; but it further proposes that there shall be no more promotions, and that the line shall be reduced in number and the rank shall be decreased as it may be by death or resignation, or the placing of its members upon the retired list. It contemplates the gradual reduction of this top-heavy system. It provides that it shall no longer be built up from the lower ranks, but that as members fall out, by death, promotion, or retirement, the system shall be gradually reduced and the members decreased. With four hundred and eighty officers, as I have already said, forced into the discharge, really and substantially, of civil duties, it is manifest that the Navy is overburdened with supernumeraries, which must be further evident from the fact that we have one hundred and forty of them with nothing whatever to do at this time.

Mr. ANDERSON. Those two together make up the number.

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly; those two together are equal to the whole number that are engaged in service upon the sea.

Mr. Chairman, all I desire in this matter is to have the committee fully possessed of these facts. Something was said the other day by the gentleman from Indiana about the pride with which these men point to the new decorations which they receive by promotion. Decorations, now, won how? Not in fighting with their ships, but decorations won simply by age, not by service. The decoration to which Lord Nelson referred was one which he won in conflict with the enemy, and not one which came to him simply by rusting away in the discharge of clerical duties in connection with a bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the formal amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. I withdraw it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I renew it. There are two provisions, as I understand, which the amendment proposes to strike out; one relating to the convening of a board to select persons to be recommended for promotion, and the other looking to the abolition of the rank of commodore. I would have been glad had the amendment been confined to striking out the first of those provisions instead of its striking out both. I entirely concur with the committee in the proposition to abolish the office of commodore. I have before me the Naval Register of the United States, showing the commodores on the active list, twenty-five in number. The only sea service these twenty-five gentlemen have done is as follows: one of them has seen eleven months' service; another has seen one month's service; and the remainder, making twenty-three, have not seen a single moment of sea service during the time they have held their commissions.

Mr. DEZENDORF. Not as commodores, but they have all seen sea service in other grades.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope my friend from Virginia will not take up my time. I would be glad to yield to him if I had time.

So far as the commodores are concerned, I say that only two of them have seen any service during the period they have held their commissions. I have not stated that they had not seen sea service before their promotion. I am simply discussing the question of the rank of commodore and stating these facts to illustrate what the gentleman from New Jersey has said, that these commodores fill a useless office in our Navy. They are too large for a ship and too small for a squadron, and they are used for home service.

We have about one-third of our Navy now doing sea duty, one-third of it on shore duty, and the other third doing absolutely nothing. Why, sir, should this be? Why should we not find something for the officers of the Navy to do as well as for the officers of the Army? Why should we keep up this system in which it is impossible to employ more than one-third of the officers of the Navy? If this is true, then why shall we not make this reduction? Does not the good of the service require it? There is no need for them. There is great complaint that the number of officers in the Navy is too large. It is nearly double now in the matter of compensation what it was before the war. Why should we not, on the ground of economy, the public service being benefited by it, consent to these reductions?

I hold, sir, that whenever the public interest is to be subserved by the abolition of any office in any branch of the public service we ought to respond to that demand of public necessity.

As to the provision—

That when a vacancy in the grade of rear-admiral shall occur in time of peace it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to convene a board of three officers not below the grade of rear-admiral, who shall select the names of five officers not below the grade of captain, one of whom shall be nominated by the President to fill said vacancy—

I am opposed to that. They now go up under statute by seniority rule, not by Presidential appointment. There is no abridgment of Presidential power by this provision. He has more power under this provision than he has under the present law; and it is for that very reason that I am opposed to it. They go up as the law now stands under the seniority rule, subject to the qualification that they shall be examined by a board to ascertain their mental, moral, physical, and professional condition; and when they shall have passed this board, then they are entitled to their position. I want to keep the officers of the Army and of the Navy intact from Presidential influence. I do not want the appointments to be made in this method. Every single one of them feels that now, under the laws of the land, he has a guarantee that he has but to discharge his duty as a faithful officer, and no political influence in this land can touch him. So I would keep him. I would not make it possible that the Executive by favoritism in the appointment of boards could yield to political influence to forward the purposes of political friends over deserving officers. I shall vote against this amendment with a view to offering an amendment striking out the first proviso.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I shall support the effort inaugurated by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] looking to the division of this question; and I am very glad to see that the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] having charge of the bill, indicates his willingness to have the question divided.

I shall favor, Mr. Chairman, that portion of this paragraph which abolishes the grade of commodore in the American Navy, because I do not believe that we have any necessity for such a grade of office. I shall, however, support the amendment that moves to strike out that part of the paragraph consisting of the proviso which begins in line 118 and extends to line 124; I mean that portion of this bill which provides for a board of three rear-admirals to select five names from which the President shall nominate where promotion is to be had. I do not believe that this House, upon calm and deliberate consideration, will adopt that provision of this bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. If my friend from Kentucky will allow me, I will say that I understand the gentleman from New Jersey does not seriously object to that going out.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I understand the gentleman from New Jersey accedes to a demand for a division of this question, and I addressed myself to that portion of the bill extending from line 118 to line 124, which provides a method of promotion.

I do not believe that upon mature reflection this House will keep in that portion of the bill and crystallize it into law. It will result, as we may readily see, in putting promotions to the grade of rear-admirals in commission. These rear-admirals, I care not how honest, how impartial, or how fair they may endeavor to be, when they come to select five names from which one is to be taken for promotion, will of necessity lean to those subordinate officers who have seen service with them afloat, and will of necessity and in spite of their own efforts be prejudiced in behalf of the officers with whom they have been in personal contact and against those who have not seen service with them.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. HISCOCK. I make it for his benefit as well as for the benefit of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON.] How would it suit him to have the provision so changed that the President in his discretion may adopt the recommendation of that board?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I think substantially the same objection would apply. I was coming to the second objection which I have to this method of promotion. First, I say that it will be impossible for these three rear-admirals, culling and selecting from lower grades of naval officers, to be judicial, impartial, and perfectly fair.

But admit that they could be, and I doubt not they would try to be—admit that they could be—and what would be the result? We will then have five names sent to the President from which one must be taken by him. The instant you do that there will not be an atom of influence, Congressional or political, on either side, in either House of Congress, that will not be whipped into service and dragooned into use and brought to bear upon the President in the interest of each of these five candidates. You will have the somewhat novel, and certainly not pleasing, spectacle presented of five officers of equal grade and rank, saving date of commission, all struggling through political influence, and through extraneous influence, to induce favorable action on the part of the Executive; and four of the five necessarily endeavoring to defeat the just aspirations of the other.

Now I do not believe that this House, when it comes to consider this question calmly and deliberately, will agree to make that the law instead of that which has existed from the organization of our Navy until now, and under whose wise and just provisions every deserving officer of the Navy has even chances, according to his grade and the date of his commission.

I trust that feature of the bill will be stricken out. I trust that some other method may be suggested by the gentleman in charge of the bill, if indeed he means to change the present routine of promotion at all; for this scheme I am sure will not answer the purpose that I am satisfied the gentleman from New Jersey is seeking to accomplish.

I hope a division of the question will be granted and that we will have an opportunity to vote upon the two distinct and separate propositions: first, whether we will abolish the grade of commodore in the Navy as a useless ornamental branch of the service; and, second, whether we will agree to accept this method of advancement and promotion in the naval service of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] if he will consent——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair proposes to recognize the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. MCLANE.]

Mr. ATKINS. Before the gentleman proceeds, I would suggest that in line 123 of the bill the word "shall" may be stricken out and the word "may" inserted; so that it will read "one of whom may be nominated by the President to fill such vacancy."

Mr. BLOUNT. Had you not better wait until we get through with this amendment?

Mr. ATKINS. I am offering it as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. That amendment will be acceptable.

The CHAIRMAN. If no objection is made, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] will be considered agreed to.

There was no objection, and the amendment to the amendment was adopted.

Mr. ATKINS. I will remark while I am up, though I did not rise for the purpose of saying anything——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] is recognized.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. With the permission of the gentleman from Maryland, I will say right there that if the Committee on Appropriations is ready to accept "may" instead of "shall," they must be quite ready to admit a very feeble proposition; therefore it shows that they do not care very much about it, for it does not amount to anything.

Mr. ATKINS. The word "may" is intended to leave it discretionary with the President.

Mr. McLANE. I hope there will be no division of the amendment at all, and that the Committee of the Whole will be at liberty to vote upon the motion to strike out the whole matter, embracing the several provisos.

As to this rank of commodore, it is the rank of high honor and distinction in the service. It is the rank under which all the great battles of the war were fought; and although it was then a rank of courtesy, it was still as well established as if it had been provided for by law.

Prior to our own war of the rebellion the rank of captain was the highest rank known to the law; but Stewart, Hull, Decatur, Perry, Porter, McDonough, Jones, and others, and all the heroes of our foreign wars were known as commodores, and by courtesy every man who commanded a fleet was recognized by the title of commodore.

Mr. ATKINS. I trust the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him a moment, for I know he does not want to misstate the facts. If he will turn to the Naval Register he will find that the total sea service of these twenty-five commodores amounts, in one case, to one year and eleven months, in another case to one year and two months, in another case to three months, and in another to one month; and that is all the sea service that all the commodores now on the active list ever performed.

Mr. McLANE. I am not going to get away from the question, and I have made no reference to the sea service of either commodores or admirals. I have only five minutes to state the case. Section 1363 of the Revised Statutes gave the effect of law to these ranks of commodore and admiral; and the two following sections provide how the promotions shall be made. The present bill destroys the effect of these latter sections, which constitute an admirable law. By the existing enactments it is provided that in time of war men shall be taken from any grade, if they have rendered honorable and distinguished service and have received the thanks of Congress, and in time of peace they shall be nominated as admirals by seniority only when they are shown to be qualified upon examination. This bill does away with that examination and substitutes for it the capricious judgment of five admirals. A more vicious mode of promotion could not be devised. With what propriety should five officers, who are already admirals, decide which of their brother officers shall come into their corps? Why open all this matter to the favoritism and personal caprice of men in the service? They are the last men in the world who ought to be selected to indicate who shall be promoted to their own grade. Why should we interfere with the President at all except to provide proper rules and regulations for the government of the Navy.

By this bill you abolish section 1366, which provides for an examination; and in my judgment it is questionable whether you do not also abolish section 1365, which enables the President to promote from any rank a man who has been distinguished for gallant service, and has received the thanks of Congress.

As to this idea that commodores are useless, if there is anybody useless to-day it is the admiral, with our present naval force. There is no command for admirals, but ample for commodores. I am not disposed to interfere with the admirals, however; but if you are going to argue that there is a useless grade in the Navy, it must be the highest grade, for which you have no proper command. You have ships, you have squadrons, however small; they are sufficient to constitute a commodore command.

But with your present Navy you never have a proper command for an admiral. If you want to reduce, stop promotions. I do not say that officers shall be dismissed, but promote no more men to be admirals until you have a fleet for an admiral to command. You have to-day fleets for a commodore. The idea that the rank of commodore is useless is frivolous. The rank of commodore is an active rank, as much so as that of commander or captain or lieutenant. It has its proper place; and I will add, Mr. Chairman, it is the only rank that has any proper place in the Navy to-day. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRAGG obtained the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be regarded as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRAGG. I renew the pro forma amendment. Mr. Chairman, I do not profess to have any very great familiarity with the Navy; but I do profess to have some knowledge of the operations of the "kitchen cabinet," whose members wine and dine and leg about Washington from Department to Department until influence is secured by which, in times of peace, incompetent men under the power of selection are placed over the heads of better men than they—men upon whom the country relies when it needs service.

I am in favor of making appointments by selection in time of war; for then the merit of the man will compel the appointing power to make the selection from the proper officers. But when we make selections for "piping times of peace" we have the "kitchen cabinet" making soft places for their friends, while soldiers and sailors of merit are compelled to hold subordinate positions until war brings them again to the front.

It is utterly impossible in the way society is organized and political influences brought to bear in this country in times of peace to give the power of promotion by selection and have it properly exercised. Look at the Army. See men who are junior in rank, not superior in merit, not superior in qualification, not superior in action in the field, appointed over the heads of their seniors, who, while the appointees were mere brigade commanders, commanded corps and brought honor and glory to the American flag. They are appointed why? Because by marriage or by some other relation they reach the Presidential ear. The soldier is struck down and the favorite promoted.

I hope the provision will be stricken from the bill.

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Chairman, I think there is a misunderstanding as to the real condition of this question. In the ordinary processes of advancement in the Army and the Navy, education and experience are allowed to have their proper progression. When we come, however, to those positions which carry with them general command, there it is the policy of all other nations, and it is the policy of this Government with regard to the Army, to make appointments by selection. In the Army of the United States officers advance by regular promotion up to the rank of colonel. From that point when nominations are made for responsible commands, selections of those who shall be generals are made from the men who have illustrated their power of combination and comprehension and energetic action. That is the policy of the Government which has been established by a practice since the Government began, and it has worked satisfactorily all along the line.

Now, then, we have here, by a provision of the law of 1862, that promotions from commodores to rear-admirals shall be made in the regular order of progression, limiting the whole power of the President. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] objects to our provision because he says it restricts the power of the President. Our provision enlarges it. If a statute can control that power, it is already absolutely controlled.

Mr. McLANE. Does the gentleman say Congress can control the President's power to appoint?

Mr. ROBESON. I do not say we can, but I do say this, that there is a great difference between the power to restrict the appointments and the naming of the class from which the appointments shall be made, and the universal practice of the legislation of this country since Congress has undertaken to regulate these things has recognized the power of the legislative branch to fix the limits, define the class, and regulate the particular persons from whom the selection shall be made. If a man were sent by the President from civil life to the head of the Navy or Army and confirmed by the Senate, I know, Mr. Chairman, that it would present a difficult and doubtful question for the Supreme Court of the United States to decide. But, I say, so far as the constant practice of the legislation of this country is concerned, it has been to restrain and limit the class, to point out the particular number of particular persons, the particular situations they shall occupy, from whom these appointments shall be made.

In striking at this list of commodores I have only this to say, that we have selected that grade which is admitted to be, not only by the opinion of every man who knows anything about the service itself, but by the action of the Navy Department always, an utterly useless grade. If you will take that list of twenty-five commodores you will see that but two of them have ever been to sea as commodores, one of them for eleven months and one of them for one month.

Mr. ATKINS. Let me correct the gentleman from New Jersey—one for one year and eleven months, one for one year and two months, one for three months, and one for one month.

Mr. ROBESON. Under their present commission?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir; under their present commission. That is all the service they have ever performed as commodores.

Mr. ROBESON. I find the gentleman is mistaken. If he will look at the first designation under the term "commodore" and "sea service under present commission" he will find one was in commission, that is Commodore Shufeldt, who commanded a ship that went around the world, one year and eleven months, and one of them for one month, that is Commodore Luce, at the bottom of the list, who has been to sea one month in command of the school-ship.

Mr. McLANE. Will the gentleman allow me one word?

Mr. ROBESON. Presently. That is all the service they have ever had.

As I have said, we have stricken out one hundred and forty-five officers of the staff corps. Let us strike down all useless officers, admitted useless officers of this grade.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to amend the amendment by striking out in lines 118 to 124 the following words:

And provided further, That when a vacancy in the grade of rear-admiral shall occur in time of peace, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to convene a board of three officers not below the grade of rear-admiral, who shall select the names of five officers not below the grade of captain, one of whom shall be nominated by the President to fill said vacancy.

I do not care to take up the time of the House in discussing that amendment to the amendment. It has been already argued here, and I shall merely ask for a vote. [Cries of "Vote!"] I understand the gentleman from New Jersey does not object to my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT's amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KNOTT. Is it not in order at this time to move an amendment in the way of perfecting the text which it is proposed to strike out?

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment of that nature is in order.

Mr. KNOTT. I offer the following amendment: I move in line 15 to insert, after the word "made," the words "after July, 1883," so it will read "and no more promotions to the grade of commodore shall be made after July 1, 1883." I understand, Mr. Chairman, there is no objection made to this amendment to the amendment by the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. ROBESON. I do not object to the amendment to the amendment moved by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana to strike out——

Mr. TALBOTT. I desire to offer an amendment to the effect that no officer shall be promoted under the provisions of this act unless his mental, moral, and professional fitness——

Mr. ROBESON. That is not affected by this provision of the bill in any way or shape. I am willing to accept the amendment if I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland will reduce his amendment to writing. In the mean time the gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Chairman, so far as the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT,] which has just been adopted, is concerned, I regard the action of the committee upon it as perfectly proper and legitimate. There is no efficient military or naval service existing in the world where promotions are not made by seniority. The stimulus to the performance of duty and the hope of reward by promotion are unquestionable incentives to all officers whether in the Army, Navy, or civil life.

But it is said that the commodores of our Navy are not at sea, and this has been alleged as one of the reasons for abolishing the grade. Well, we have no ships, as has been acknowledged on all hands, consequently it is not their fault that they are not at sea. It is said also that this bill, by the retirement of that grade, saves money. Seven thousand dollars for the present is the extent of the saving in that direction. That, Mr. Chairman, would not build ships creditable to the nation or formidable to enemies. We compare it with the cost of the repair of monitors, to which reference has been made in this debate. But if the commodores are not at sea and there are no ships in which to employ them, is there any reason why, in the interest or in the direction of economy we should strike out that grade in the Navy altogether? We had new grades made of ensigns, of commanders, and of commodores and admirals, and it is said that on our retired list there are large numbers of admirals; that they served but a short time, and are now performing other duty, but that notwithstanding the length of service of many of them, now in their old age they must be turned out upon the common without a support from the Government. If we want to turn the admirals out and promote economy in the Government in that respect, or in the reduction of their pay, I must confess that I have heard no substantial reason from the gentleman who introduced this bill, or from those who advocate it on this floor, why we should strike at the grade of commodore. They are useful at the navy-yards and stations throughout the country, as the gentleman himself admits. They are useful in the various Departments of the Government in this city, as has been admitted on all hands; and that they are certainly useful in the command of squadrons no one has denied in the advocacy of this bill.

As said by the gentleman from Maryland, we have no fleets to command, and therefore our admirals are unemployed. It has also been said, Mr. Chairman, on the other side of the Chamber, and reiterated in eloquent terms by the distinguished gentleman from Maryland, that the grade of commodore is a well-established grade in the American Navy and in the minds of the American people. The heroic men who illustrated gloriously the power of our Navy in the war of 1812 and 1813, when our armies were defeated or surrendered, and the Capitol burned by an invading army, who by their gallant acts at sea bore aloft the standard of the United States to victory and raised this country to its proud eminence, were called by the people commodores. The men who commanded squadrons are by the American people called commodores. It is a name well known, and with it the names of illustrious men are cherished. I regret, therefore, Mr. Chairman, to see this attempt to strike down that time-honored and distinguished grade in our Navy. If it be for the interest of economy that changes should be made in the naval service, let it be made all along the line wherever reform is necessary to produce economy, and not strike out the names of those men who have earned promotion by gallant services rendered to the country.

The officers of the Navy of the United States are the peers of those of any of the navies of the world by training, education, and faithful service. Of the officers, the commodores who have earned their rank as a class are creditable to the nation, and their example is an incentive to captains to attain that rank. We may have use for the Navy when, if ever, we build one, as no one can foresee when or for what reasons the calamity of war may fall to this nation, as we are not exempt from the destiny of nations. I do trust we will not do a great wrong and injustice in the interest of an economy so parsimonious. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TALBOTT. I now offer the amendment of which I gave notice a moment since.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided further that no officer shall be promoted under the provisions of this act unless his mental, moral, and professional fitness shall have been established according to the provisions of sections 1496 and 1497 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. ROBESON. There is no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRIGGS. I now offer an amendment to come in after the one just adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

That whenever, on an inquiry had pursuant to law concerning the fitness of an officer of the Navy for promotion, it shall appear that such officer is unfit to perform at sea the duties of the place to which it is proposed to promote him, by reason of drunkenness, or from any cause arising from his own misconduct or want of capacity not caused by or in consequence of the performance of his duty, he shall not be placed on the retired list of the Navy, and he shall be discharged.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from New Jersey a moment to the amendment which has just been accepted, offered by the gentleman from Maryland, and also to the provision which has just been offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire. As I understand it, the text of the bill is amended in so far as it provides for a board, &c. Now, is there any reason why the subsequent provision, which provides that any commodore over whom a junior in rank is promoted shall be placed on the retired list, should not be stricken out of the bill?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. That is just what I was about to suggest.

Mr. HISCOCK. And the result is the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT] and the amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIGGS] would certainly not be in order and would not be pertinent, because we would not then be interfering with the law as it now stands with reference to promotion. If the gentleman from New Jersey sees no objection, I ask unanimous consent that the provision which has been amended by the gentleman from Maryland, with the amendment, go out of the bill; I mean down to the word "Navy," in line 128. As I understand, the balance of the section has been ruled out on a point of order. The provision which I think should go out of the bill with the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland commences with the words "and provided further," at line 124, namely, the words "that any commodore over whom a junior in rank is thus promoted may, upon his own application, be placed upon the retired list," &c., down to the word "Navy," at the end of line 128, according to the print I have of the bill. The amendment of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT] and that of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIGGS] will be included in that as part of the text which should now go out of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York state precisely what he proposes?

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask that by unanimous consent the proviso of the bill I have referred to, with the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, go out of the bill.

Mr. TALBOTT. Beginning with line 112?

Mr. HISCOCK. No, sir.

Mr. ATKINS. Does the gentleman from New York state that that part of the bill beginning with "and provided further," in line 124, to "rear-admiral," in line 127, has been stricken out?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. No; but he says it should be.

Mr. ATKINS. The portion which follows has been stricken out upon a point of order raised by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] namely, these words:

And the provisions of the laws retiring other naval officers shall apply in all respects to the Admiral and Vice-Admiral of the Navy.

Those are the only words in that part of the paragraph that are out.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understand that is out. Now I have suggested and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] was about to suggest that with the clause of the bill which provides for a board of examination the subsequent provision in the bill should also go out.

Mr. ATKINS. I think so.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Because they are directly connected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT] shall be considered as stricken out of the bill.

Mr. TALBOTT. If it all goes out, I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York again state what he desires?

Mr. ROBESON. I think I can state it so that it will be understood. If the proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] is accepted all the bill beginning with the words "and provided further," in line 118, down to the words "United States," in line 136, will be out, and there will be inserted in it the provision of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT] and the provision offered as an amendment by the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. BRIGGS.]

Mr. REED. That is, there will be nothing left of the section after the word "act" in line 118.

Mr. ROBESON. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there unanimous consent that all that portion of the paragraph which has just been indicated be stricken out and that the amendments of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT] and the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIGGS] be inserted in their place?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to amend by striking out, in line 113, the words "made by selection." As the law now stands—

During war rear-admirals shall be selected from those officers on the active list, not below the grade of commanders, who shall have eminently distinguished themselves by courage, skill, and genius in their profession; but no officer shall be so promoted, under this provision, unless, upon recommendation of the President by name, he has received the thanks of Congress for distinguished service.

During peace, vacancies in the grade of rear-admirals shall be filled by regular promotion from the list of commodores, subject to examination according to law.

Which examination relates to the mental, moral, physical, and professional qualifications. I think that law ought to stand. A few moments ago the committee, with a view to returning to that law, struck out the provision from line 118 to line 124. I find on examination of the bill, however, the words "made by selection." The law of seniority is still overturned, and in a more offensive way than it would be with that board remaining in the bill. I trust the committee will see fit to strike that out.

I do want to see the hand of political influence kept off the Army and the Navy. I do want those men to feel when they have devoted their lives to their professions that no political cabal shall deprive them of their rights, and I trust the gentleman from New Jersey will leave us with the law as it has been standing for years and years.

Mr. REED. As the matter stands now, the proposition is before the House to abolish the grade of commodore and make no promotions after July 1, 1883. That amendment, so made, removes some of the objections which have heretofore existed, namely, that some officers who were distinguished in the war were deprived by this proposed amendment, as it originally stood, to the law of the chance of promotion which they now have under the law as it stands.

The question we have got to consider is whether that grade ought not to be abolished. The gentleman from New Jersey has shown conclusively that there is no need whatever of it in the service. Consequently the only argument that can be urged in favor of its retention is the personal argument on the part of gentlemen who are in the naval service. I grant you that ought to have just and proper weight. I grant you that it is in the nature of a quasi vested right, and ought not to be disturbed except for good, sound reasons. But, on the other hand, the Government has some rights, and the people of the United States ought to exercise their power if they deem it for the good of the naval service; and these two arguments ought to be weighed against each other. There never will come a time when the personal argument cannot be used.

There seems to be no reason from the necessities of the public service why this grade should be continued. It ought therefore to be abolished. It is an unnecessary excrescence, the sole purpose of which is to give assimilated rank with officers of the Army, which is not needed now and was but a sentiment originally. After you rise from the position of captain you have got a grade which needs something more than routine service. It means abilities on a great scale.

An admiral is a different man from a captain. The office of admiral requires different powers and different capacity. A man may make a good captain and a poor admiral; and there ought to be the same system that is in use in the Army. After you get above the grade of the command of a single ship there ought to be power in the President to appoint a man who is capable of managing a fleet, just as the President now has power to appoint as general a man who has the capacity of managing an army.

But I wish to say in addition, in regard to this matter of abolishing the grade of commodore, that when you compare the rate of promotion in the Navy with the rate of promotion in the Army, rank by rank, you will find that the Navy has been more liberally treated than the Army has been; and even if we abolish this rank of commodore it will still continue so.

There is no good reason why the two arms of the service should not be on an equality, and an equality which will be of use and advantage to the country. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MCLANE. I have no desire to detain the committee further, and would not say a word more if I did not think that both the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] have not responded to the objection I made to this paragraph.

It has been treated somewhat as if it were in the line of economy, while it is in just exactly the opposite line. This rank of commodore, I have said, is a necessary rank and gives a man the command of a squadron when he ceases to command a single ship, for that is the proper command of a captain. If you have two or three ships, that will be the proper command for a commodore; and if you have a larger fleet, that will be the proper command for an admiral.

And here comes in the question of expense in making commands for your commodores and admirals. The Secretary of the Navy has fallen into the habit of giving to admirals the command of all squadrons, large or small. That is the reason why, if you take the Navy Register, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] did, you see that the commodores never go to sea as commodores. That is because the Secretary of the Navy prefers to send admirals to sea. If he has a little squadron of two vessels cruising about at the north pole, or at the south pole, or anywhere else in the wide world, he sends out an admiral instead of a commodore to take command of them.

The effect of abolishing your rank of commodore, which is a rank for small commands, will be to make admirals of all your officers above captains. And all your officers above captains when retired will be retired as admirals; whereas to-day they are retired as commodores as well as admirals. Therefore, the only practical effect of this provision in the bill will be to increase the expense of your retired list, and in the end to render it very unpopular and an unnecessary burden on the country.

The very men whom you would retire now as commodores at the age of sixty-two, you will hereafter retire, if this provision of the bill shall become law, as admirals, because then the captain will go straight to the rank of admiral; and then when he reaches the age of sixty-two, he will be retired as admiral on three-fourths of the pay of admiral. But if you do not abolish the rank of commodore, the captain will be promoted to be commodore, and at sixty-two will be retired only on commodore's pay.

This provision of the bill, therefore, is directly in the line of increasing the expense of the Navy, and it destroys harmony in the service. It takes from the Navy a proper rank, a proper grade, and it puts every captain when he is promoted at once into the rank of admiral. I think, therefore, this portion of the bill should be stricken out and the integrity of the service maintained in accordance with existing laws.

Mr. ROBESON. I have only to say in reply to the gentleman from Maryland that his proposition cuts off promotion from the whole line of active officers of the Navy, and leaves the list of captains to go unpromoted. The bill provides that selections may be made from commodores and captains.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of saying that while this amendment may be subject to the criticism made by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] though I doubt it, if it is subject to that criticism it can be changed so as to avoid that trouble.

As the law is proposed to be changed this whole matter is put in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy and the President, and these appointments are made political appointments and political influences will control them. I would vote against any provision in this paragraph rather than see the Navy subject to such influences.

I had trusted that the gentleman from New Jersey would see fit to consent that these political influences should not have play in the Navy. While I am in favor of the provision in reference to commodores, if this little saving is to take place at the expense of cursing the higher officers in the Navy with political influences, then for one I shall vote for the continuance of the law as it now is as to commodores. But if the gentleman will consent that the law shall stand as it has been for years in the matter of promotions, as the law has been tried and proved, instead of seeking to place this legislation on an appropriation bill, then I will be content with the other proposition. But never, so far as my vote and words may go, shall the appointment of the highest officers of the Navy be subjected to political influences.

Mr. ROBESON. I have yielded to the wishes of my friend from Georgia all along the line to-day. I have allowed him until now to perfect this section according to his ideas. Now if there is to be any effective service in the Navy, if the men who served during the war are to have their chance for promotion while they have life and activity, if we are to have in command of our fleets men who have some blood in their veins, men of energy, courage, and capacity, we must apply to the Navy precisely the same rule which we now apply to the Army. This section accomplishes that. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BLOUNT, to strike out the words "by selection," in line 113, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 40, noes 31.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. CALKINS, to strike out from the word "provided," inclusive, in line 112, down to and including the word "act," in line 118, there were—ayes 42, noes 31; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ROBESON and Mr. CURTIN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported ayes 28, noes 73.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay to petty officers, seamen, ordinary seamen, landsmen, and boys, including men in the engineers' force, and for the Coast Survey Service, not exceeding 8,250 in all, $2,490,000.

Mr. ROBESON. By direction of the committee I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the active list of lieutenants of the Navy shall hereafter consist of two hundred; and until the number of lieutenants now on the active list of the Navy shall be reduced below the number of two hundred no promotion shall be made to fill vacancies occurring in said grade: Provided, That no lieutenant now in the service shall be reduced in rank or deprived of his commission by reason of the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingent expenses of the Navy, namely: For rent and furniture of buildings and offices not in navy-yards; expenses of courts-martial and courts of inquiry, boards of investigation, examining boards, with clerks' and witnesses' fees, and traveling expenses and costs; stationery and recording; expenses of purchasing-paymasters' offices at the various cities, including clerks, furniture, fuel, stationery, and incidental expenses; newspapers and advertising; foreign postage; telegraphing, foreign and domestic; telephones; copying; care of library; mail and express wagons and livery and express fees and costs of suits; commissions, warrants, diplomas, and discharges; relief of vessels in distress and pilotage; recovery of valuables from shipwrecks; quarantine expenses; care and transportation of the dead; reports, professional investigation, and information from abroad; and all other emergencies, and extraordinary expenses arising at home or abroad, but impossible to be anticipated or classified, exclusive of personal services in the Navy Department or any of its subordinate bureaus or offices at Washington, District of Columbia, $100,000.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend by striking out at the close of this paragraph "$100,000" and inserting "$80,000." Out of this contingent fund for the present year, there has been expended about $20,000 for clerical force. That force has been provided for at this session in the legislative appropriation bill. Therefore I think the appropriation ought to be reduced to $80,000.

Mr. ROBESON. I will remind my friend from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] that the appropriation for this fund by the law of last year was $100,000; and although $20,000, or nearly this sum, which was expended last year for clerical force, has been provided for at this session in another bill, yet there is a deficiency this year for this purpose of $16,500. The whole difference between the amount here proposed and the actual expenditure during the last year is $3,500. Hence we thought (and I supposed the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] agreed with me) that it was better to leave the appropriation at the old figure.

Mr. ATKINS. No, sir; I did not agree with the gentleman.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. ATKINS, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bureau of Navigation:

For foreign and local pilotage and towage of ships of war; services and materials in correcting compasses on board ship, and for adjusting and testing compasses on shore; nautical and astronomical instruments, nautical books, maps, charts, and sailing directions, and repairs of nautical instruments for ships of war; books for libraries for ships of war; naval signals and apparatus, namely, signal-lights, lanterns, rockets, running-lights, drawings, and engravings for signal-books; compass-fittings, including binnacles, tripods, and other appendages of ships' compasses; logs and other appliances for measuring the ship's way, and leads and other appliances for sounding; lanterns and lamps, and their appendages, for general use on board ship, including those for the cabin, ward-room, and steerage, for the holds and spirit-room, for decks and quartermasters' use; bunting and other materials for flags, and making and repairing flags of all kinds; oil for ships of war other than that used for the engineer department, candles when used as a substitute for oil in binnacles and running-lights, for chimneys and wicks, and soap, used in navigation department; stationery for commanders and navigators of vessels of war, and for use of courts-martial; musical instruments and music for vessels of war; steering-signals and indicators, and for speaking-tubes and gongs, for signal communication on board vessels of war, $100,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move pro forma to strike out the last word of this paragraph, for the purpose of calling attention to what I look upon as an error in the manner of making up these appropriations for the Bureau of Navigation. In all the appropriation acts for a number of years past specific appropriations have been made for the various particular objects. For instance, in an act of a former year I read:

For foreign and local pilotage and towage of ships of war, $45,000.

For services and materials in correcting compasses on board ship and for adjusting and testing compasses on shore, $3,000.

I might read more than a page of these itemized appropriations. But the present bill in appropriating for the Bureau of Navigation simply designates the different objects, and then provides an appropriation in gross of $100,000. This, it seems to me, is taking a backward step in the matter of appropriations. The tendency has been to appropriate more and more by detail, and to hold the Departments to a strict conformity to the various expenditures authorized. Not only has this practice been growing on our part, but in the British Government it is wonderful to observe the detailed methods of estimating and making appropriations.

The pending paragraph provides in bulk an appropriation of $100,000 which may be used for any or all of these purposes. I have not had opportunity to examine this bill in time to prepare amendments with the view of separating these items. Therefore I do nothing more than call attention to the point. I know it is urged sometimes that by appropriating the fund in gross there can be a more economical use of the money. Theoretically this may be true; but practically the best interests of the Government are found in requiring every item to be estimated and the expenditures to be held down strictly to the amounts appropriated.

You have the check of the estimate and of your appropriation bills against abuse in any of these items. I withdraw the amendment, as I simply wished to call the attention of the House to what I regard as an abuse.

Mr. ATKINS. There is a large reduction in this item for contingent expenses of the Bureau of Navigation. As the committee will see, there are a great many items for which this appropriation is made, such as freight and transportation of navigation materials, postage and telegraphing on public business, &c. I believe the bill of last year carried $222,000, while this does not carry so much by many thousands of dollars.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from New Jersey says it is only a reduction of $11,000.

Mr. ROBESON. On that one item.

Mr. ATKINS. Oh, it is more than that. The bill carries $128,000, so that there is a reduction of nearly $90,000 for this Bureau of Navigation. It was suggested that much money could be saved by letting the appropriation be made in bulk to cover all of these small items. That is the justification of the action of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the civil establishment at navy-yards and stations, $5,208.62.

Mr. BOWMAN. I move to amend by striking out $5,208.62, and inserting in lieu thereof $10,417.25.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think as this is the first item in which we strike the question of suspending work in the navy-yards, it ought to be brought to the attention of the House and voted on.

It will be observed that concerning similar items on all the bureau accounts the committee have reported one-half of what is asked for by the Department in the Book of Estimates. The Department says in order to carry on the necessary work as it has been carried on, such and such items are necessary, which items the committee have split in half, and this is the first item for the civil establishment in the navy-yards.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not oppose, but I might favor dismantling some of the navy-yards, but I submit we ought not in this haphazard and guessing sort of way to say that those yards shall be closed up or what yards shall be closed. I do not think in this haphazard way we ought to decide this question, but that it should be investigated by a commission. It should be decided just what yards shall be closed, just what yards are most available, and then a legislative bill should be brought in closing up those yards which are not necessary.

But the committee, as against the estimate of the Navy Department, proposes here to cripple the yards, leaving this question of closing them unsettled, and cuts in two the appropriations which have been decided to be necessary.

And this involves likewise, Mr. Chairman, the question of whether the necessary repairs shall be carried on or abandoned, because the Navy Department likewise says that to carry on these necessary repairs, and in order not to abandon the policy of keeping the present vessels in decent repair, these sums are necessary, and the committee have halved the sums. It does seem to me, until Congress shall establish what yards shall be closed and whether they shall be sold, we ought not to incorporate this legislation on an appropriation bill. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that this is not a reduction on former appropriations, even as the text stands in the bill. This is not one of the items where the gentleman from New Jersey proposes to reduce the amount one-half. I find in the former appropriation bills the proposition stands as follows:

For contingent expenses of the Bureau of Navigation, namely: For freight and transportation of navigation materials; postage and telegraphing on public business; advertising for proposals; packing-boxes and materials; and all other contingent expenses, $3,000.

This is in the appropriation bill of the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, and then there was no deficiency. The same provision, if I recollect aright, is contained in the next appropriation bill if my recollection serves me right, where the same amount of $3,000 was appropriated. This bill appropriates $4,000 for the Bureau of Navigation, and the gentleman from Massachusetts proposes $10,000.

Mr. ROBESON. We have passed from the paragraph providing for the contingent expenses of the Bureau of Navigation. We are now on the civil establishment of navy-yards.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman is correct, and I find the pending paragraph is about one-half of what it was last year, but he is not correct as to its being one-half of the appropriation of former years. I misapprehend the paragraph before the House for consideration.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I move to strike out the last word. At a meeting of a quorum of the Committee on Naval Affairs on yesterday I was instructed, or authorized, by the committee to move to increase this appropriation from $5,000 to $10,000. But, Mr. Chairman, if we are to do no more in our navy-yards than we are at present doing, I should not object to the proposed reduction of this sum to $5,000 or any other amount. I agree with the Committee on Appropriations that unless the navy-yards are to be made of some more use than at present we had better close them all. At a later point in this bill I shall move an amendment authorizing the construction of five new vessels of war——

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question in this connection?

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask if the gentleman has any objection, with the consent of the gentleman from New Jersey, to pass this amendment informally and return to it hereafter?

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. No, sir; that is the point I was about to make. I would like to pass over all of the provisions of this portion of the bill and down to the Bureau of Construction and Repair, until the matter is hereafter settled as to whether any work shall be done.

Mr. BLOUNT. I meant with reference to this particular item.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I have none; and I think if the House will agree to the amendment authorizing the construction of five ships of war that we will want to go over all of these provisions and increase the appropriations to correspond.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Chairman, I trust this amendment will not prevail. We have upon our Pacific coast but one navy-yard. We have upon the Atlantic seaboard a navy-yard at Portsmouth, one at Brooklyn, one at Norfolk, one at League Island; we have one at Charlestown, one at Washington, and one on the Gulf coast at Pensacola. Now it is perfectly patent, Mr. Chairman, what the Committee on Appropriations meant by this particular item in the bill. It is plainly to be seen that when it inserted in the bill the sum of $5,000 for the maintenance of the civil establishment at the navy-yards it had in view a reduction of the yards in the sum appropriated of exactly one-half. This amendment proposes to restore the original sum. The Committee on Appropriations make a provision here for the closing of worthless or useless or unnecessary establishments, and in my judgment the committee have acted wisely in this matter. It has not acted without full consideration on the subject. The superintendent of Yards and Docks has been before the committee and was interrogated and closely questioned with reference to this proposition. He said that there were several of these yards that were of no use whatever; that they were expensive to keep in repair; they were of little service to the Government, and ought to be closed. He has gone even further, and said that some of these yards might be given away with profit to the Government, or that their total cost up to this time might be donated as a bonus to anybody who would take them off the hands of the Government and relieve it from the further care of them.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Will the gentleman from Kentucky permit me to ask him if that chief of bureau named the navy-yard——

Mr. BLACKBURN. He was speaking generally upon the subject——

Mr. WHITTHORNE. And, if so, I would like to know which one it was, and then to ask if the committee has recommended the abolition of that yard?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will answer the gentleman no, and for this reason, and I supported the action of the committee enthusiastically and thoroughly: they proposed by the provision now under consideration to leave that question to the discretion of the Navy Department to close one-half of the Atlantic seaboard navy-yards. It necessarily requires that one-half of them shall be closed, and no one left in them in the shape of a civil establishment except an officer in charge of the public property. The Committee on Appropriations, in my judgment, as I have stated, acted wisely in this recommendation, and also in its refusal to recommend the closing of any particular navy-yard, but decided to leave the matter entirely in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy to close such as he might deem unnecessary to keep open for the naval purposes of the country, in order that coming Congresses might act advisedly in directing the sale of such property or making such disposition of it as might be advisable.

This, Mr. Chairman, is not experimental legislation; it is deliberately taken after mature examination and conclusion. In my opinion, it is the wisest thing that can be done with reference to these yards. I cannot see anything myself, nor have I heard a word brought before this committee in the shape of argument, in support of the advisability of the policy that looks to the maintenance of seven navy-yards—six upon the Atlantic coast and one upon the Gulf coast—while we have but one upon the whole Pacific seaboard. We are not utilizing them to-day. There was a proposition before the committee to establish a new one at New London, but the committee refused to appropriate for it upon the conviction that we had already more than we really had use for, and that it would be a needless and extravagant expenditure of the public money. I trust the committee will be supported——

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman say there is no navy-yard at New London?

Mr. BLACKBURN. There is not a navy-yard there. Land was donated to the Government for the purpose of establishing a navy-yard there, and it has been accepted, but no navy-yard has yet been constructed, and none exists there to-day. The Committee on Appropriations——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ELLIS took the floor and yielded to Mr. BLACKBURN.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I thank the gentleman; I only want to use a minute more.

The Committee on Appropriations rejected a proposition looking to the appropriation of $150,000 for the establishment of a navy-yard at New London. There were strong arguments urged in favor of having a navy-yard at that point. It is natural those arguments were urged upon the committee and their weight was recognized in many respects; and nothing in my judgment prevented that committee from recommending an appropriation of $150,000 for building a navy-yard at that point except the conviction which had possessed them, coming from the best information they could command, that we had too many already, and that instead of building new ones, wise statesmanship, a just regard for economy in the expenditure of the public money, and common reason dictated and demanded the closing of some already in existence.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will my friend from Kentucky allow me to say now in this connection that the Forty-fourth Congress had almost this identical provision in the naval bill, and had the same purpose as the present committee in regard to the navy-yards.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask my friend from Georgia whether the Forty-fourth Congress reduced by one-half the appropriations of the year before for the maintenance of the civil establishment of the navy-yards?

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not want to take up the gentleman's time or I would answer him. I will answer directly in my own time. There was a large reduction and the committee of that Congress had the same purpose as the present one.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then I want to emphasize the purpose of the committee of that Congress. My recollection is, and a friend who sits by me corroborates it, that that proposition of the Forty-fourth Congress was voted down in the Senate Chamber and did not become a law. But whether it did or not it does not affect the question pending before this House at the present time.

I insist that this Government is maintaining eight navy-yards where it needs no more than five, or perhaps four. And I insist that the committee in this bill does right when it proposes to put a premium on the closing of surplus and useless navy-yards. No interest of the naval service, I am sure, will suffer. The discretion of the Secretary of the Navy is left without trammel or limitation. It is advisory legislation for the use of subsequent Congresses, and I sincerely trust the amendment will be rejected. [Mr. BOWMAN rose.] Before the gentleman from Massachusetts proceeds I desire to correct a statement I made a moment ago. My recollection now is that the legislation referred to failed by being defeated in the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, that is true; by the Republicans all voting with a faction over on this side of the House.

Mr. BOWMAN. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making a suggestion. I understand the committee to suggest they would be willing this should be passed over until we should see what would be done with the rest of the bill and what the amount of work and property would be that would go to the navy-yards, and what would be the work outside. If they have no objection to this being passed over for the present, I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. ROBESON. As we have got into the discussion of this question, and have already taken half an hour upon it, I think we had better dispose of it now.

Mr. CANNON. I was for this provision in the committee, and I am for it now. Navy-yards in this country, if maintained at all, should be maintained for the general good. If ships are to be built at all, I suppose in the future, as in the past, they will very largely be built in private yards; and that in any event navy-yards will only be used for repairs. The object of the committee was, as has been stated, that a part of these navy-yards should be closed; and no one has controverted the assertion that they can be properly closed, and still all repairs made and all ships built that are necessary.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] I only want to say one word.

Now I think we have for the first time found the milk in the cocoanut, and found just what is under this change of law. For the gentleman from Illinois announces what I understand to be the policy of the committee, which has not thus been announced before. The gentleman says, if I understood him, that undoubtedly hereafter all ships will be built in private yards, and that the navy-yards will be used only for repairs.

Mr. CANNON. I beg the gentleman's pardon, if he will allow me. In what I said as to where the ships should be built I did not speak for the committee. But I did say that whether new ships were built or not, one-half of these navy-yards, with or without private yards, were sufficient to make all repairs and build all new ships, and therefore we ought to dispense with some of them.

Mr. BOWMAN. I do not wish to discuss the question as to whether men-of-war could best be built in private ship-yards or in public. But I mean to say that I think the Committee on Appropriations have forestalled this question, and intend a policy to be adopted under this bill of having certainly one-half, and probably the whole of the new ships of war built in the private ship-yards by contract.

I do not discuss it. I suppose the expense of maintaining the yards would build a splendid ship of war every year. But I do say, Mr. Chairman, that when we have these great navy-yards completely stocked with extensive "plants" of the best machinery prepared to build vessels, and with expert mechanics in them, it is absurd to consider the question of maintaining those yards and yet to have the building of the new ships go on outside in private ship-yards not so well stocked as the public ones, and to adopt this policy on an appropriation bill.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to say only one word with regard to this proposition. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] was too eager to grab at a remark made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and to say that it was an admission fatal to this clause in the bill. The gentleman from Illinois, as he has already announced to this committee, spoke for himself; he did not speak for anybody else. And I will say more, that the gentleman from Illinois, for the first time this morning, announced any expression of opinion of that kind, so far as I have heard any expression of opinion from him. I heard no such opinion from him in the Committee on Appropriations or from any other member of that committee in reference to cutting down one-half the expense of our civil establishment in connection with navy-yards. Allow me to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that no expression of opinion was made in the Committee on Appropriations that our ships should hereafter be constructed in private ship-yards, and nothing of the kind was said that looked to any such proposition.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. ATKINS. No, sir.

Mr. BOWMAN. Not one question?

Mr. ATKINS. Not now; I would rather not at this point.

I hope this committee will come to a conclusion on this proposition and assert its policy, so that it may run through the whole bill. The whole question is what the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] has announced to you—the whole question as to whether we shall continue all these navy-yards or not as involved in the proposition now before the Committee of the Whole; and I trust members of the committee will look to it carefully and determine it.

Do we need all these navy-yards? There is not a naval man of distinction in the United States, I venture to assert, who will say to-day that there is any necessity for all these navy-yards.

Mr. TALBOTT. Is there a single navy-yard in the United States which has not to-day four or five vessels in it for repairs, according to the Naval Register?

Mr. ATKINS. That may be so; but I believe it is the opinion of the naval authorities that most of them are not worth the repairing.

The proposition in this bill is not to destroy all the navy-yards, but only to cut down the expense of the civil establishment one-half. Why may not one-half of the navy-yards which we are now maintaining be maintained up to the present standard with one-half of the appropriations which have heretofore been made? As a matter of course they can.

As I intimated the other day in the remarks which I made upon this subject, I believe the common judgment of the country, the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy and of everybody else, is that we need maintain only two navy-yards on the Atlantic coast and one upon the Pacific coast. And if it is necessary, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy, to retain one on the Gulf coast he can do so.

This is no proposition to let out the construction of future ships of the Navy of this country to private contract; no such proposition is contained in the bill. And the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] need not attempt to distort the remark made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] as an expression of the opinion of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman now let me ask him one question?

Mr. ATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. BOWMAN. I think it is due to me in all courtesy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] has expired.

Mr. HISCOCK. The reason why the proposition was declined to pass over this item until the question of how many ships should be built was disposed of, was because the Committee on Appropriations have not inaugurated in this bill any policy in reference to where the ships shall be built, if they are to be built, whether in private yards or in public navy-yards.

This, however, is true: if they are to be built in the public yards I think every gentleman who knows anything about our navy-yards will agree with me that the expenditures upon certain yards should be discontinued, and all the expenditure concentrated upon a few of our navy-yards, so that they might be put in condition to build these ships.

It is a notorious fact that if we should undertake to build one of these ships there is not now a navy-yard in the United States which is prepared to undertake its construction. I appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. HARRIS] to state if there is to-day a navy-yard in the United States with all the docks and necessary appliances for the building of one of these ships.

The money to be expended upon our navy-yards should be concentrated and expended upon fewer yards, if it should be the policy for the Government in the future to build its own ships. It is because this proposition in the bill is in no way connected with the question whether we shall build new ships or they shall be constructed in private navy-yards, it was because that was in no way connected with this proposition that we have declined to pass over this provision for the present.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. BOWMAN. A question which I have been trying for five minutes to have answered?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly, I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. BOWMAN. It is whether it was not contemplated by the committee that if these new ships were to be built, at least one-half and perhaps more of them were to be built in private yards?

Mr. HISCOCK. Not to my knowledge.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. REAGAN. A little further on in this bill I shall offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I move pro forma to amend by striking out the last word. Inasmuch as the question of the number of yards to be preserved is being discussed, I wish to say a word. I thoroughly agree with the policy indicated by the Committee on Appropriations—the inauguration of a plan to reduce the number of navy-yards. For economy and efficiency in the public service I think this policy is undoubtedly right. While there is nothing in the bill looking to the particular yards to be discontinued or preserved, some of the gentlemen who have discussed this matter have indicated that perhaps there ought to be two navy-yards on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific coast. This I think right; but in determining the yards which ought to be continued, my judgment is that the one at Pensacola ought to be preserved as a yard of repairs, if for no other purpose. While it might not be absolutely necessary for that purpose in time of peace it would be very convenient. Vessels cruising on the Gulf—vessels in the revenue-marine service and others—might well be repaired there, as the work could be done at much less expense than to carry them far up the coast. But in case of war there would be a Gulf frontier of 1,500 miles with but two places having any pretense of fortification. The coast, except at those two places and those inadequately fortified, would be entirely exposed to the ravages of the enemy.

It seems to me that as a matter of national policy it would be dangerous to leave that extensive sea-coast, exposed as it is, in such a condition that vessels upon the Gulf could not even be repaired. In time of war, if a vessel should be crippled upon the Gulf of Mexico or any part of its extensive coast, it would be a matter of great difficulty and danger to remove it out of the Gulf, around the capes of Florida, and up the Atlantic coast to any point at which there might be a navy-yard.

Hence it seems to me of essential importance to preserve the Pensacola yard as a yard of repair. I submit that it would be a great mistake to abolish that yard. The expense to the Government of maintaining it would be overcome by its convenience and advantages. The retention of the yard there would strengthen our maritime defense at a point where it is most exposed of all others in the country and where it would be most costly and difficult to secure repairs of vessels.

Inasmuch as the general subject is not up, I desired only to make these remarks expressing my full agreement with the committee in the policy of reducing the number of these yards, and at the same time my opinion as to the propriety of preserving the yard at Pensacola as a yard of repair.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Chairman, as regards the policy indicated by the committee of abolishing certain navy-yards and stations, I for one am in favor of it. Some years ago, as a representative of the then Naval Committee of the House, I advocated a proposition of this kind which was recommended by that committee. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] has precipitated, as I think, the discussion of the real merits of the proposition submitted in this bill. My opinion has been indicated by the question which I put to my friend from Kentucky. In my judgment the Brooklyn, Norfolk, and Mare Island navy-yards should be kept as yards for construction and repair; the yards at New London, League Island, and possibly Kittery, ought to be abolished as navy-yards.

Mr. REED. Not "possibly Kittery."

Mr. WHITTHORNE. It might be kept as a repairing station.

Mr. REED. I only wanted to call attention to what I knew was an inadvertence.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. The Charlestown or Boston navy-yard and the navy-yard at Washington might be continued as manufacturing yards.

But the mistake, as I think, which the committee has made (and I will discuss it more fully hereafter) is in providing that the question as to the policy of discontinuing yards and the selection of the yards to be abolished shall be left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy. That officer, when vested with this discretion, may differ with every gentleman on this floor. He may dismantle the Brooklyn yard, the Norfolk yard, the League Island yard, the Pensacola yard. While the power is in our hands as representatives of the interests of the people I think we ought to exercise it, or, if necessary, delegate to some competent authority the investigation of this question, requiring a report to be made to Congress, so that we may act intelligently upon the subject. The danger is that in the exercise of the discretion proposed a vast destruction of the property interests of the Government may occur, without power on our part to remedy it.

In the policy of the committee, so far as it looks to the reduction of navy-yards and the expenses of the civil establishment, I heartily concur. The only difference that may arise between us will be as to the manner of effecting this reform.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I desire to say now, that the committee may understand what is contemplated by the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I desired to say yesterday, when this bill was considered generally, that when we came to the proposition contained in it to abolish certain navy-yards and to the several provisions reducing the pay of the civil establishment one-half, we grouped those questions all together and came to this conclusion: that this subject had not received from the proper committee full investigation; and one member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, my friend from Philadelphia, [Mr. O'NEILL,] was authorized at the proper stage in this debate to offer an amendment instructing the Speaker of this House to appoint three members and the President of the Senate to appoint three Senators and the Secretary of the Navy one gentleman, who should constitute a commission which should during the vacation investigate this whole subject, visiting all the yards, and report at the opening of Congress in December next what yards should be closed, what yards should be sold, if any, and in what manner the yards for the future should be used, which for constructing and repairing yards and which for manufacturing yards.

We feel—I feel myself this striking down the civil establishment now and crippling the yards at once would be unwise, and therefore I prefer these several questions should be taken all together at one time, in order if possible to inaugurate some plan by which this whole question of the use of the navy-yards in the future can be wisely considered. I make this statement in order that gentlemen on the floor may understand what is coming during this debate.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether he would not undertake for his committee to do this work and not ask for a commission. We seem to have reached the idea we can do nothing without a commission. When we had a commission for the rights of women, and a commission on whisky, I thought we had exhausted the subject. [Laughter.] Now let us try to do something ourselves.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Perhaps it was considered too immodest to suggest the whole subject should be committed to the Committee on Naval Affairs of this House.

Mr. REAGAN. I should much prefer to have that committee consider it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HISCOCK. I renew the amendment, as I understand the gentleman has withdrawn it. We do not desire on this bill to say what navy-yards shall be discontinued, nor do we desire the Secretary of the Navy to say what yards shall be permanently discontinued and disposed of. Bring in your bill providing for something of that sort. What we provide for is this: if there be certain navy-yards for which we have no use now, let the Secretary of the Navy keep them in their present condition. We provide for a force by which they may be watched and taken care of, and closed if he pleases. We are not looking to the sale and disposition of navy-yards. That is not the policy of the committee at all.

The appointment of a commission on this bill would be out of place. Whenever gentlemen desire to put in a proposition to sell certain navy-yards let them do it by a separate bill. We are giving the Secretary of the Navy no discretion to dispose of yards at all. If he has no use for them, if there is nothing to be done in them, if there is no work to be carried on in them, let him provide for watching and taking care of them, and spend no more money on them. That is the policy of the bill.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have very many earnest convictions on the subject of these navy-yards on different points. I think there should be a reduction in number. I think it should be judiciously done, either by recommendation of the joint committee or otherwise. I believe that the Government workshops are seeds at once of corruption and extravagance, and I think the enlightened nations of the world are all learning to depend on private workshops. I wish to say a word about League Island. The city of Philadelphia, as I thought and said at the time, when invited by the then Government to learn what terms League Island could be obtained for a naval station, foolishly agreed to make it a present, and purchased the island conditioned that it was to be paid for when the Government should have accepted it. The money derived from the sale of the old yard was, as part of the contract, to have been applied to League Island.

Now, as an American, I rejoiced in the fact that the Federal Government had come into possession of a naval station on fresh water, the cure of iron ships from disease inflicted on them by salt water; while I rejoiced they had a station so far in the interior as to be beyond the reach of the most potent agents that foreign governments could establish, that it was near, in the opening year of iron and steel vessels, to the coal and iron fields of the country, and to a population skilled in every branch of the industries involved in the maintenance of a great naval station, for any character of workshops—while, I say, as an American citizen I rejoiced at all this, as a Philadelphian I grieved, and did not hesitate to express my personal grief, that two and a half miles of the best river front of that city should have been surrendered to Government workshops, seeming to me to be an outrage upon the city then and upon the posterity of its then citizens; and I would, as an individual citizen of Philadelphia, rejoice if the Government of the United States would restore League Island to Philadelphia on condition that that city reimburse the Government for all permanent expenditures made on that island.

None of the proceeds of the sale of the old yard went to this improvement. Faith was not kept by the Government. There are on two and a half miles of river front a petty workshop that does not give employment to 25 per cent. of the number of men employed in many of our private workshops. The work is uncertain, fitful, and too often used for political ends. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, instead of standing here to plead for the maintenance of the navy-yard at that point, I ask for a scientific investigation of the subject; and if it be determined to retain any part of League Island, that the investigating board shall determine how much of the river front and the back channel of the river may with safety to the Government be ceded to the patriotic city that presented it to the then administration with Abraham Lincoln at its head; and who, with Gustavus C. Fox and Gideon Welles administering the Navy, decided it to be the best site for an iron-clad construction yard and for the rendezvous of iron vessels returning from sea that the world presented.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman, I only desire to say a word in response to the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted upon the pending amendment.

Mr. BOWMAN. I move, then, to strike out the last two words. In reply to the gentleman from New York I have only to say that I have insisted this question ought to be examined, as all great questions are examined, by a scientific commission. The gentleman from New York says the Committee on Appropriations did not propose to say, "close the navy-yards."

Well, will the gentleman allow me to ask what he would propose to say or to do, then, to close them? They want, he says, to give the power to the Secretary of the Navy to dismantle the navy-yards, and he may remove all of the property from one to another yard, and when in another year the question comes up as to what navy-yard shall be maintained, Congress is to determine that matter. Two yards, then, come in competition, one of which has been stripped of everything, and the other the recipient of all of the property which has been taken from the first. One question, then, to be considered would be perhaps of economy in the disposition of the property on hand and the cost of its return to the yard whence it was taken. And I would like to ask my friend if dismantling the yard is not, therefore, practically deciding the question beforehand? I am in favor myself of closing some of the yards; and yet, although I think it would be wise to do so, I know there are many questions which ought to be investigated and fully considered, and which it was essential that the Committee on Appropriations should have understood before they could have acted upon the subject or recommended any positive action to this body.

There are many questions which the committee should have asked and have been able themselves to answer; and I venture the assertion that the committee can answer none of them. For example, could they answer the question as to the value of the Philadelphia, Boston, or Kittery yards? What is the value of the real estate of these yards? Is there a demand for the property? Could it be sold if placed in the market? Do merchants want it? Do the railroads want it? What is the character of the buildings as compared with other yards? What is the cost of maintaining them as compared with other yards? Are they on deep water? Is it necessary to dredge every year to maintain communication between your navy-yards and the ocean? What is the character of the machinery as compared with other yards? What is the comparative cost of construction there as compared with other yards? All of these questions are important to be considered in that connection, and yet none of them, I venture to assert, can be answered by the Committee on Appropriations; and yet we are asked to take action upon a matter of this magnitude and importance when the committee itself is without the necessary information. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ROBESON. If there is to be further debate upon this paragraph, I shall move that the committee rise to limit it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will yield for a moment; I oppose the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, but I ask the attention of the gentleman having the bill in charge for a moment. I find that in the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress the sum appropriated for all of the civil establishments in the navy-yards was $85,000, and the following provision was ingrafted upon the appropriation bill:

And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to organize a naval board of five commissioned officers in the Navy as soon as practicable, three of whom shall be senior officers on the active list of the Navy, whose duty it shall be to examine fully and determine whether any one of the navy-yards can be dispensed with and abandoned; and if so to report the best manner of making disposition of the same, and further to inquire, &c.

Now, the question I wish to ask the gentleman from New Jersey is whether that board was ever organized, and if so whether it made a report?

Mr. ROBESON. I will answer the gentleman just here if he will permit me. The board was organized and was composed of Admiral Porter, Vice-Admiral Rowan, Rear-Admiral Charles H. Davis, a naval constructor, and a naval engineer. They reported that the yards at New York, at Norfolk, and at Mare Island, should be kept open; that the yard at Pensacola should be kept in good condition, and the other yards put in ordinary.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, my recollection is substantially as the gentleman from New Jersey has stated it. The House has been informed through an official channel of just what may be done, and its recommendation is in harmony with the provisions of this bill. I trust, therefore, the committee will not hesitate to sustain the provision just as it stands. I would remark further that the appropriations made by both sessions of the Forty-fourth Congress were but $85,000, for the purpose of compelling, if possible, the adoption of what was demanded by the principles of economy and securing the thorough management of such navy-yards as should be actually kept up. I do not think the reduction here is large enough——

Mr. ROBESON. I will say to the gentleman, if he will permit me again, that the appropriations for the maintenance of the civil service at the various yards are scattered through all the bureaus. This is only an appropriation for a single bureau. In each bureau the appropriation has been stricken down fully one-half.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that. The only difference between what is now proposed and what was done in the Forty-fourth Congress is that then the whole was appropriated in a single item, $85,000. Here it is distributed through the various bureaus. But I consider it should be dispensed with entirely; and that was the view taken by gentlemen who examined the matter thoroughly in the Forty-fourth Congress. I do not see why so large a sum as $65,000 should be appropriated for the purpose; because that is within $20,000 of what was appropriated in both sessions of the Forty-fourth Congress, and yet there was no deficiency.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. The gentleman having ascertained what was the report of the commission appointed in the Forty-fourth Congress, will he offer a proposition to incorporate that report in this bill? Then we will know what is to be done, and it will not be left to the discretion of any one.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the result of that report is substantially incorporated in this bill as it stands; substantially, not in terms, I admit, but it takes an important step in that direction, I think.

The CHAIRMAN proceeded to put the question on agreeing to Mr. BOWMAN's amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to say one word.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is dividing.

Mr. ATKINS. I will reserve what I have to say until another paragraph is reached.

The amendment offered by Mr. BOWMAN was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, which informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 6014) to admit free of duty articles intended for the exhibition of art and industry to be held at Boston, Massachusetts, during the year 1883;

An act (H. R. No. 5559) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 4222) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 248) to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following paragraph under the head "Bureau of Ordnance:"

For steel rifled breech-loading guns, with carriages and ammunition, $100,000.

Mr. BAYNE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 245 add these words:

"Provided, That the guns herein provided for shall be made on not less than two of the latest improved systems of breech-loading."

Mr. BAYNE rose.

Mr. HISCOCK. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. BAYNE. I would like to hear what is the gentleman's point of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let the amendment be reported again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. BAYNE. Recent developments and investigation in the Ordnance Department have shown the fact to be that if there is not some direction on the part of Congress as to the kind of arms and guns that may be used, some special arm, or some special plan or system has been adopted; and the investigation has shown that there was to a certain extent favoritism, and that certain guns that had been invented many years ago and that had been tested for a considerable period of time, had been suffered to remain for many years untested, while other guns had been taken up and an effort had been made to bring them into a condition which would authorize the Government in using them; but that every one of those guns had signally failed, and that the Government had expended hundreds upon hundreds of thousands of dollars in vain efforts to patch up and make good a bad and rotten system.

Now, sir, in order to preclude, if possible, an effort in the same direction hereafter, although a board has been appointed and sat upon various systems and made various recommendations, in order to preclude hereafter any such course as that on the part of those who may be immediately interested, I submit that an amendment of this kind should be adopted and added to the bill, so that there will be at least a rivalry between the two systems as to which should turn out the best, and then we shall have the judgment of those who use these guns, and we shall have an opportunity of bringing into competition systems that vary from each other to a very considerable degree and thus get the best guns into the service.

I think that unless Congress takes some step of this kind you will find that but one single system will be adopted, and that it will be just as likely as not that that system will not be the best, but in all probability will be one of the worst, a system which has some influential supporters, and which, through those influential supporters will be tested and applied while better ones remain in abeyance.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DEZENDORF. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania how many of those latest improved guns can be built for $100,000?

Mr. BAYNE. In reply to that inquiry, I will say that two guns can, and that will test two systems.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. The estimate on which this appropriation was based was for $220,000. During the investigation which the Committee on Naval Affairs had upon the subject of guns, ships, &c., we found that the purpose of this appropriation was to make an effort to construct two guns in the navy-yard at Washington.

It is probable that the construction of no gun can be attempted in that navy-yard larger than a 6-inch rifled gun. Now, I am not much in favor of spending money in that way. The guns which the ships of the Navy carry should be 10-inch breech-loading rifled guns, which have been demonstrated to be the most effective guns in the world. And I am not much inclined to expend money on experiments on little 6-inch rifled guns.

I rose, however, to say that in my opinion this item of the bill should be passed over for the present, and for this reason: the Committee on Naval Affairs propose to ask the House to authorize in this bill the construction of two steel ships of war to be armed with rifled guns of the very best character, and the estimate which we give covers the ships and the guns. After that shall have been done we could then put on that portion of the bill the limitation on the kind of guns which my friend from Pennylvania [Mr. BAYNE] desires. I hope this paragraph will be passed over for the present, to be considered hereafter.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment moved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BAYNE.]

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I now ask that this item be passed over for the present, to be considered hereafter.

The CHAIRMAN. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I ask that unanimous consent.

Mr. ROBESON. The objection we have to that is that the estimate for this proposition was $220,000. After close investigation we ascertained from the Bureau of Ordnance that they could get along with perhaps from $100,000 to $150,000; that that amount would do for this year in deciding upon other plans, experimenting in materials, and making arrangements for perfecting the guns. We have therefore given them only $100,000 for this year.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands there is objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS] to pass over this paragraph for the present, and further debate is not in order.

Mr. THOMAS. I move to strike out the paragraph. The investigation that was had by the Committee on Naval Affairs disclosed the most wonderful state of affairs in the Ordnance Bureau of the Navy Department that the world has ever seen. It is only equaled by the man whom Gulliver found in the island of Laputa, who had been engaged for eight years in endeavoring to extract sunbeams from encumbers with a view of warming the king's garden on raw days. [Laughter.]

This Ordnance Bureau is in itself an experiment; it is continually engaged in some of the most hair-brained experiments that have ever been heard of. The officers of that bureau seem to learn nothing from the experience of other nations. They seem to have been hung up on the pegs of the past, and to be able to learn no lessons of wisdom whatever from the experiments of intelligent investigators in other nations of the world on the subject of naval ordnance.

The chief of that bureau came before our committee and was closely questioned as to what he proposed to do in case money was put at his disposal. He said he proposed to go on and look into the question and investigate and experiment, and hoped that in the course of three years, possibly in two years, he might produce one gun. He wanted $250,000 for that purpose.

Now, it seems to me that if the Congress of the United States has any sort of regard for the interest of the Government or of the people it will make an appropriation expressly for certain guns which have been found to be the kind of guns that can be used in case of war—high-power, breech-loading, steel guns, such as are employed by the other navies of the world, and stop this nonsense, this frittering away and squandering of the people's money to keep up a style of so-called experiment in the Ordnance Bureau of the Navy Department.

I tell you, Mr. Chairman, that we have reached the time when we ought to look on the question intelligently, as men of business. We ought to make an appropriation to build some first-class, high-power steel guns that could be effective in case of war. We have now popguns enough such as the Ordnance Bureau have been producing, and which are of no earthly use whatever. That bureau is simply expending the people's money to keep up a kind of experimental shop and to gratify the taste of some inquiring minds, chiefly that of the head of the bureau.

Mr. ROBESON. I trust that this paragraph will not be stricken out. If we are to have any guns we must have them constructed under the intelligent and scientific supervision of the Department and bureau to which their construction is intrusted. If we are to have any effective guns they must be produced, judged of, and accepted by the intelligent, scientific knowledge of that scientific bureau to which that question is presented.

We cannot here pass appropriations for the guns of inventors which we are not competent to judge of. We cannot here pass appropriations for special gun factories and furnace shops whose capacity we do not know anything about, and the production of which might not be safe for our Navy nor dangerous to an enemy.

Here is a proposition which authorizes this bureau to proceed this year in an experimental way, for that is about all that it does. We have to determine what guns we will have before we can get to work and produce them.

Mr. THOMAS. Have not these experiments been going on for the last twenty years, and has there been one solitary gun produced by the bureau that can be regarded as even fifth rate?

Mr. ROBESON. I do not know about the last twenty years; but if the complaint is that the thing has not been done, that is no reason why we should not do it now. We have an appropriation here which will allow this bureau to produce and try one or two rifled steel breech-loading guns of large caliber, which will be models for the guns to be cast for these new ships. We must have these models, and they must be tested, before we can venture to provide guns. If we do not adopt a provision of this kind, then when we get our new ships we shall have nothing to go upon in providing them with guns; we shall have to go abroad and buy our guns from Krupp & Co., or somebody else. This appropriation is for the very purpose of making the experiments necessary to put into our hands the means of completing the armament of the new ships, for which the gentleman from Illinois and myself are both advocates.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. THOMAS, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the civil establishment of navy-yards and stations, $18,953.12: Provided, That if the Secretary of the Navy shall find that work at all the navy-yards now maintained cannot be carried on with advantage to the service and economy to the Government for the amounts in this act appropriated for the maintenance of and civil establishment at the navy-yards, he shall not make any deficiency for these purposes, but he shall suspend work at those yards where he finds it can best be dispensed with, and shall close such yards and transfer all perishable stores and property therefrom to other yards for use therein; and at the yards so closed only such officers and employés shall be retained as are necessary to preserve and take care of the property of the Government, and all other persons shall be transferred or discharged: Provided further, That the navy-yard at Washington, District of Columbia, may, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, be maintained as a manufacturing yard for the Bureaus of Equipment and Recruiting and Ordnance, and that work may be continued in the rope-walk in the Boston navy-yard: And provided further, That nothing herein shall be held to interfere with the permanent improvement of any navy-yard as now authorized by law, or the expenditure for such purpose of any money appropriated by Congress therefor.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I ask the Committee of the Whole to go back for a moment to the paragraph beginning with line 260, to which I wish to offer an amendment. It is in regard to torpedoes, for which the committee have for some reason inserted in the bill an appropriation of only $60,000. I think there should be a larger appropriation for this purpose; and I wish to offer an amendment to increase the amount to $200,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there unanimous consent to go back to the paragraph indicated, that the gentleman from Massachusetts may offer an amendment? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I move to amend by striking out $60,000, in the paragraph making appropriation for the torpedo corps, and inserting $200,000.

Mr. Chairman, the torpedo has now become a very important weapon of defense; all other countries of the world are arming themselves with torpedoes. In this country we have practically but one torpedo of any value, which by reason of the improvements that have been made is now practically antiquated. I refer to the Lay torpedo, a specimen of which can be seen at the navy-yard here. Commodore Sicard, chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, said before the committee that in his opinion the Government ought to spend a considerable sum of money in providing torpedoes for the defense of our harbors. The torpedo which he would probably purchase is the fish torpedo, now used extensively in the English navy. The cost of these torpedoes is about $7,000 apiece. The English Government has bought, for the sum of $80,000, the right to use that torpedo, purchasing also at the regular price fifty torpedoes ready for use. It was in our country that the torpedo originated, and here the greatest improvements in it have been made. There is hardly a torpedo in the world that has not in some way derived advantage from American inventions.

Experiments on torpedoes known as the rocket torpedo have been carried on by the Ordnance Department for the last four years. The inventor of that torpedo spent twelve years in the service of the Government without one dollar of pay, expecting that he would some time be rewarded for his services. He has at last placed his invention in the hands of a private firm, who have gone to work for its complete development. That torpedo moves on the water at the rate of one hundred miles an hour. It carries at its head a charge of dynamite or gunpowder, and explodes as may be desired either at the surface or beneath the surface. If you use the more powerful explosive, you may explode the torpedo at the surface with terrible destructive power. If you use gunpowder you may explode the torpedo under a ship's bottom ten or fifteen feet below the surface of the water. I do not know that this torpedo will ever be of any value; but the Government of the United States ought to have a sufficient appropriation provided to purchase or construct the most effective weapon of this kind which the world produces.

It is proposed in this bill to appropriate $60,000 for this purpose. What will be done with it? Every dollar of it will be carried to Newport and spent in experimenting by certain torpedo officers. I think the Secretary of the Navy should have power to purchase some torpedoes of real value.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, the provision in this bill with reference to torpedoes is not unlike that in regard to ordnance, and was inspired by the same spirit on the part of the committee. In preparing the bill, we had in view first to strike down the expensive naval organization which exists to-day, and then to do something to add to the strength of the Navy.

And I say to the committee we were prompted by the desire to cut down the appropriations. We do not desire largely to increase them, because we do not think it is necessary. There is no purpose, there is no object, I say, now of putting the American Navy on a war footing. We believe we can do it by degrees. We believe the first work we should set about is the building of more ships, and that so far as ammunition is concerned, and to a certain extent torpedoes are of that character and of speedy manufacture comparatively, we should confine ourselves to the limit of experiment. We believe we should take the money and devote it to the construction of new vessels for the Navy. That has been our policy, and I believe it has been a wise policy on the part of the Committee on Appropriations, and I believe it is a policy which should be adopted by this Committee of the Whole House and adopted by the House.

The provisions of the bill as they stand compared with the existing law in full operation as far as we have gone with them will reduce the expenditure over half a million of dollars a year. Now, let us devote our time and attention to developing those features of the American Navy which are more demanded. We do not want torpedoes unless we have ships. Well, we do not want them as much as we want ships. The gentleman says we want them just as much as we want ships. We do not want them as much as we want ships. Ships are the prime necessity, and let us devote ourselves for a time to them. This, as I have said, Mr. Chairman, has been the policy of the Committee on Appropriations, and I hope it may be indorsed.

The amendment of Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, was rejected.

Mr. REAGAN. I move the following amendment:

Amend by adding after "navy-yard," in line 326, these words:

"And the navy-yard at Pensacola, Florida, shall be preserved for repairs of vessels of war and other Government vessels."

Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word in offering that amendment. The committee, in framing the bill, has indicated that the Washington navy-yard should be reserved for recruiting purposes. The committee has also indicated that the Boston navy-yard should be reserved for recruiting purposes. Now, I wish the bill to indicate also that the Pensacola navy-yard shall be reserved for repairs of vessels of war and other Government vessels.

I stated a few moments ago the great extent of sea-coast on the Gulf of Mexico, and the exposed condition of that sea-coast in case of war, and the difficulty of getting vessels, if crippled, out of the Gulf and up the Atlantic coast to a place of repair. When we remember the city of New Orleans is the second city in the amount of exports in the Government; when we regard the vast amount of commerce coming out of the Mississippi and requiring protection and security there; when we remember that Pensacola, Mobile, Galveston, Indianola, Corpus Christi, Brazos Santiago, and a number of other places have a commerce exposed to depredation in case of hostilities, we find there is a national necessity, so large, so important, and unprotected it seems to me in this bill, inasmuch as there is a purpose to indicate one or two other yards shall be preserved for given purposes, that the Pensacola navy-yard ought not to be lost sight of as one that should be preserved for the purpose of repair.

Now, I say this, Mr. Chairman: while fully agreeing with the committee that some course ought to be adopted for the reduction of the number of navy-yards, I do not think that extensive sea-coast, exposed and defenseless as it is, with its rapidly growing commerce and interests, should be left entirely without the means of repairing the vessels of war and the repair of other Government vessels, especially those engaged in the revenue marine. Therefore I hope the committee will adopt the amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am opposed to putting anything in this bill that may be considered to be a direction or a limitation upon the Secretary of the Navy in this respect. I say very frankly when you once take out a yard here and a yard there, and I appeal to the gentleman from Texas if that is not the case, when you commence by this bill to give a direction to his discretion, that the result will be any reform measure in this bill will fail.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not believe the provision the gentleman has offered is at all necessary. I do not believe the Secretary of the Navy would do other than he would have him do in reference to that navy-yard. He is in a certain respect responsible, and to that degree he is responsible he must be trusted on a question of this kind, and the moment we attempt to legislate on it we are entering the realm of a commission, and we have not sought to have a commission in reference to this.

We do not propose to dispose of any navy-yard anywhere, but we do propose the Secretary of the Navy, if he has not any use for any one of them, if there is nothing to do there, this enormous expenditure of one dollar for civil establishment to one dollar spent for ships of the country shall not be kept up.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. In carrying out the idea of the Committee on Appropriations, which the gentleman seems to entertain, that this matter should be left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, and not specifying as to any particular yards, but leaving the matter entirely to him, I ask why not leave the proviso in reference to the work to be done at Washington yard and in reference to the rope-walk at the Boston navy-yard in the same condition as the others are? In other words, why not allow the suggestion contained in the bill, for I take it to be only a suggestion, in reference to the Washington navy-yard and the Boston rope-walk to go out altogether, and let them stand on the same footing as with reference to all other yards, leaving the matter to the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. ROBESON. If the gentleman from New York will permit me, I would like to answer the question of the gentleman from Georgia. He asks why we put in a provision that the Secretary of the Navy may in his discretion continue work in the Equipment and Ordnance Bureaus of the Washington navy-yard and in the rope-walk in the Boston navy-yard. In reference to this rope-walk, I will answer him by saying that it is the only rope-walk in any of the Government yards, and it is deemed by the Committee on Appropriations to be a matter of considerable importance that it should be kept up if necessary, for it will be observed in this proviso that discretion is still lodged with the Secretary to continue this work if desired. The second answer to the first part of the question is that the Bureau of Ordnance has its machinery, its shops, its magazines, and its appliances here for the making of all of the percussion ammunition for the service, and for filling shells and finishing them; and the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting has its special shops here for the manufacture of anchors and chains. These things, Mr. Chairman, have to be carefully done. Every chain has to be tested thoroughly, because in the strength of every single link of every chain often depends the safety of the ship itself as well as of the lives upon it. It is necessary, therefore, that this work should be done here under the special care and direction of this bureau; and provision in the other navy-yards is not made for such tests as this character of work requires.

Mr. REED. It is also necessary because the general authority in the bill is to discontinue the whole yard. This provides for special work in particular yards.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to strike out the last word. It may be, Mr. Chairman, as suggested by the gentleman from New York, that the Secretary of the Navy would do exactly as the gentleman has suggested, and that in the exercise of his discretion he will take into consideration the public interests and the public necessities and would preserve for public purposes the navy-yard at Pensacola. But I do not understand the logic which the gentleman uses when we are told that it is necessary to preserve the rope-walk at the Boston yard, or the works of construction and ordnance at Washington, by special enactment of law, and that the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy should control as to the defense of the fifteen hundred miles of sea-coast which is isolated from the Atlantic coasts by the capes of Florida, where there is nothing in the shape of defense or fortification whatever, and that this may be neglected.

Can it be conceived, Mr. Chairman, that the means of defense for 1,500 miles of our coast, or the means of preserving itself, can be of less interest or importance than the establishment and maintenance of a rope-walk for the Navy? I think the gentleman certainly misapprehends the question when he places that upon a footing with the other questions which are involved in this discussion. You might as well say that the navy-yard at Mare Island may be left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy. Why not? Why has this not been done by the committee? Because the committee undoubtedly recognized the fact that it was a navy-yard—and the only one—for the long, isolated Pacific sea-coast, and there was every reason in the world why for that reason it should be preserved. The very reason which induced the committee to preserve it ought to be a reason for naming and preserving another navy-yard on a separate portion of our sea-coast, isolated from the defenses which belong to the Atlantic coast.

Mr. HISCOCK. We have not saved in this bill the Brooklyn navy-yard from being discontinued and closed. We have not saved the Mare Island navy-yard from being discontinued and closed; and, as was well said by the gentleman from Maine, this discretion is to close yards if the Secretary so elects. Now, here is put into the bill a provision, as the gentleman from Maine said, an authority to keep certain of the yards open for a specific purpose, and nothing more.

Mr. REAGAN. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I renew it. Mr. Chairman, I cannot see the logic of the explanation in the way the gentleman from Maine does, and as the gentleman from New York uses it. There is a provision put into the bill that the yards and stations shall have a certain amount of money for a specific purpose; and a discretion is given to the Secretary of the Navy to close such number of them as in his judgment or discretion he may see fit to close. He may keep every one of the yards in operation if he desires. He may close up one, and may close up the yard at Boston, except as to the rope-walk. He may keep open the Washington yard for the purpose indicated by the gentleman from New Jersey. Now, these two provisions of the bill are either surplusage, that do not mean anything at all, or else they mean that the Secretary of the Navy, in addition to the sum used for all these yards, limited in this bill, may under this provision create additional liabilities for these two purposes.

If that is not it, if there is no purpose to allow him to go beyond the appropriations for these two specified objects, then it is mere surplusage and simply calculated to suggest what the gentleman seems so anxious to avoid, that some other yard should be put in here. I do not think at these two yards it amounts to anything at all.

Mr. REED. I desire to express my concurrence in the view expressed by the gentleman from Texas. I believe the way we all feel is that some navy-yards should be abolished, but above all not the navy-yard we are interested in. I feel a good deal of sympathy with that view, and I give notice that if one navy-yard is excepted I shall move to except another, of the virtues and merits of which I can give a long catalogue.

Mr. ROBESON. Before the vote is taken I only desire to say that this does not dismantle or destroy any yard. It merely puts them in ordinary as we have our forts in ordinary. We only take away the perishable property; and in time of war the Pensacola navy-yard, if it should happen to be shut in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, or the Kittery navy-yard, could be opened in a moment, and go on just as the exigencies of the war required, and be just as valuable as ever. This is sufficient to put them on a peace establishment; and if you except one you will have to except all.

The question being taken on Mr. REAGAN's amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. TALBOTT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 333 and 334 strike out the words "for the Bureaus of Equipment and Recruiting, and Ordnance;" so that it will read:

"Provided further, That the navy-yard at Washington, District of Columbia, may, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, be maintained as a manufacturing yard, and that work may be continued in the rope-walk in the Boston navy-yard."

Mr. TALBOTT. My amendment means that the Washington navy-yard shall be maintained as a manufacturing yard. I do not see and cannot possibly understand why the steam-engineering should not have been included in that paragraph. I am told that engines and boilers can be constructed at that yard, the machinery being there for the purpose. I am told that plates for iron vessels can be rolled out in that yard with the machinery which is there now, and that with a moderate expenditure of money plates for steel vessels of the second class at any rate can be made, with all the anchors, &c; and that with the new machinery for this purpose, which would not cost over $50,000, a vessel could be constructed within the walls of that navy-yard. Therefore, I think the House should adopt this amendment, which would leave the Washington navy-yard as it is now, taking into consideration all the machinery and appliances that are there.

The question being taken on Mr. TALBOTT's amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. DEZENDORF. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 317, strike out all after the word "cents" down to and including the word "for" in line 340, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"Provided, That a commission of seven members is hereby constituted, three of whom shall be appointed by the President of the Senate from the members of the Naval Committee of the Senate, and three of whom shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House from the members of the Naval Committee of the House, and one of whom shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, who shall examine into the question as to which, if any, of the navy-yards of the country are unnecessary and ought to be sold, closed, or operations suspended therein, and said commissioners shall report their conclusions to Congress at its meeting in December next; and said commission shall have authority to visit the various navy-yards of the country during the recess of Congress, and the necessary expenses for clerk hire and traveling of said commission shall be paid in equal proportion out of the contingent funds of the two Houses."

Mr. HISCOCK. I make the point of order on that amendment that it is new legislation. It provides for the creation and for the expenses of a commission. Instead of being new legislation which decreases expenditure it is new legislation which increases expenditure.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is clearly in violation of the rule, and sustains the point of order.

Mr. BOWMAN. I desire to offer an amendment, which I understand will be agreed to by the Committee on Appropriations.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "yard," in line 336, add the following:

"And that this shall not be construed as directing the Secretary of the Navy to discontinue the work in any one of the departments in said two yards."

So that it will read:

Provided further, That the navy-yard at Washington, District of Columbia, may, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, be maintained as a manufacturing yard for the Bureaus of Equipment and Recruiting and Ordnance, and that work may be continued in the rope-walk in the Boston navy-yard; and that this shall not be construed as directing the Secretary of the Navy to discontinue the work in any one of the departments in said two yards.

Mr. HISCOCK. That is not agreed to.

Mr. BOWMAN. I certainly showed that amendment to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HISCOCK.] And I ask the gentleman from New York did he not say there was no objection to it?

Mr. ATKINS. I do not agree to it.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman presented his amendment——

Mr. BOWMAN. Does this come out of my time?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly; it comes out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman showed me the amendment, and so far as I was concerned at the time I saw no objection to it. But the very moment the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] took the floor I did see an objection to it, and I have continued to see it from that time to this. I do not propose to put in this bill anything that directs the Secretary of the Navy with reference to the yards which he shall keep open or close.

Mr. BOWMAN. I hope the House will notice that half of my time has gone without my saying a word. All I want is that the committee shall say that both of those yards shall be put on a level with other yards. This clause says that work may be continued in the rope-walk in the Boston navy-yard. Now, on the well-known principle, expressio unius, exclusio alterius, if that does not mean the Secretary cannot do work in any other department, I do not know what it does mean.

Here is a section of the Revised Statutes, section 1403, which provides that cadet-engineers may be appointed as assistant naval constructors. The last two Secretaries of the Navy, Mr. Thompson and Mr. Hunt, both said that since the statute declared that cadet-engineers may be appointed as assistant naval constructors, the appointment of such constructors was limited to them, and they could only appoint from graduates from the Naval Academy. And I do not want the Secretary to say that Congress said to him work may be continued in the rope-walk of the Boston navy-yard, and therefore on the doctrine of the expression of one thing excluding the other, work might not be continued in any other department. It is a fair, legal construction which I understood the committee to agree to, and they did so; but because the gentleman from Texas made an indpeendent motion they withdraw their consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOWMAN.]

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 6, noes 28.

Mr. BOWMAN. I call for tellers.

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, no.

Mr. BOWMAN. This is an amendment to which the Committee on Appropriations saw no objection. It puts the navy-yards on a level and does not strike a blow at any of them.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] and the gentleman from New York [Mr HISCOCK] are not all the members of the Committee on Appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon ordering tellers upon the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Tellers were not ordered, there being but two in the affirmative.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I propose an amendment to the pending paragraph, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 325 and 326, strike out the words "and transfer all perishable stores and property therefrom to other yards for use therein," and insert in lieu thereof the words "and report the facts and the reasons governing his action to the next session of Congress."

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I shall not argue that amendment, but will submit to the Committee on Appropriations that it is a proper one. Under this bill the Secretary may close such navy-yards as he chooses, and can remove within a short period of time perishable stores and property, and do an immense amount of mischief. I simply propose to strike out that portion of this paragraph, and direct the Secretary of the Navy, after having closed the yards and before removing any property, to report the facts to the next session of Congress.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will say to the gentleman that we are willing to accept that portion of his amendment providing that the Secretary shall report to the next session of Congress; that is proper. So far as the removing of perishable property is concerned the Secretary of the Navy must act upon his peril; but that portion of his amendment which provides for a report to Congress is proper, and we accept it.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I will take just whatever the Committee on Appropriations will consent to; but I respectfully suggest to them this consideration: for instance, if valuable machinery here in the Washington navy-yard, by which copper is rolled and rerolled, shall be removed it cannot well be replaced.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Do you call that perishable property?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. We might differ as to what was perishable stores; but machinery that is not attached to the freehold might be held by the Secretary of the Navy to be perishable stores.

Mr. HISCOCK. I would sooner let him exercise the discretion of removal than not to give him the power of removal at all.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I will accept the proposition of the Committee on Appropriations, and will modify my amendment so as to insert after the words "transfer all perishable stores and property therefrom to other yards for use therein" these words, "and report the facts and the reasons governing his action to the next session of Congress."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

BUREAU OF PROVISIONS AND CLOTHING.

For provisions for the seamen and marines; commuted rations for officers, seamen, and marines; expenses of the handling and transportation of provisions; of inspections and storehouses; and for purchase of water for ships, and for provisions and commutation of rations for seven hundred and fifty boys, $1,000,000.

Mr. ROBESON. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to move to amend the paragraph just read by inserting after the words "water for ships" the words "for cooking and drinking purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR.

For preservation and completion of vessels on the stocks and in ordinary; purchase of materials and stores of all kinds; labor in navy-yards and on foreign stations; preservation of materials; purchase of tools; wear, tear, and repair of vessels afloat, and for general care, increase, and protection of the Navy in the line of construction and repair, and incidental expenses, namely, advertising and foreign postage, $1,750,000: Provided, That not more than $400,000 of the foregoing sum shall be applied to the repairs of any wooden ships, and that none of it shall be applied to the repairs of any wooden ship where the expense of such repair shall exceed 30 per cent. of the appraised value of the same; and any part of the said appropriation not used for repairs may be applied toward the construction of two new cruising vessels of iron or steel in substantial accordance with the recommendation of the naval advisory board, as approved by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives in their report, numbered 653, made to the House of Representatives March 8, 1882.

Mr. REED. I desire to move an amendment to this paragraph.

Mr. RANDALL. Allow me to suggest that we are now entering upon the consideration of the construction clause of the bill and there is a very thin House here.

Mr. ROBESON. We can perfect the text.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not want to impede the bill in any way, and yet I feel that we ought to have a fuller House to consider it than we now have. We might pass over this portion for the present.

Mr. REED. Let my amendment be read.

Mr. HISCOCK. The amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] is really to perfect the text.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Maine will be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out these words:

"Provided, That not more than $400,000 of the foregoing sum shall be applied to the repairs of any wooden ships, and that none of it shall be applied to the repairs of any wooden ship where the expense of such repairs shall exceed 30 per cent. of the appraised value of the same."

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Provided, That none of the foregoing sum shall be applied to the repair of any wooden ship where the expense of such repair shall exceed 30 per cent. of the estimated cost of a new vessel of the same size."

Mr. ATKINS. I think that before the amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] is considered we should determine whether we intend to appropriate $1,750,000 for this Bureau of Construction and Repair, as provided in this bill.

Mr. REED. I would like to submit some remarks on my amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. For myself I am not in favor of giving that much.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] is entitled to the floor for five minutes.

Mr. ROBESON. As the provisions in the bill which will excite interest and cause debate are now being approached; that is, the provisions relating to the Bureau of Construction and Repair and the Bureau of Steam-Engineering; and as it is now late Saturday afternoon, with very oppressive weather and a thin House, the Committee on Appropriations propose that after the text of the pending paragraph has been perfected as the amendment of the gentleman from Maine proposes, those two provisions shall be passed over for the present, and we can proceed with the consideration of the remainder of the bill, about which there will probably be no dispute, leaving these other questions to be determined when we go into committee again.

Mr. RANDALL. That is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent to passing over for the present these two subdivisions of the bill which have been indicated?

Mr. REED. Not just now.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let the text be perfected first.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, I wish to premise that this amendment meets the approval of the gentleman in charge of the bill, and I think upon explanation it will be approved by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.] We are now proposing a new departure; we are undertaking to build up a new kind of navy. We intend to build iron ships for this new navy. But while we are doing this, it is necessary for us to retain for some years the present wooden navy. Hence, it will be necessary for us to repair the ships which compose it. In order to do this we need a sum of money the amount of which we cannot now estimate; but it is perfectly apparent to persons of experience that $400,000 will not be sufficient. We have thirty-seven or thirty-eight vessels which we must keep in repair for a considerable number of years until our new navy shall be large enough to enable us to dispense with the old wooden ships. At the same time, although the sum necessary for repairs cannot be fixed, it is very undesirable to leave the matter of repairs entirely within the discretion of the Department, because we might have repairs made perhaps to an extent that would be unjustifiable in any private establishment. Therefore, it is proposed to limit the discretion of the Navy Department in this matter of repairs to 30 per cent. of the estimated original cost of a vessel of the same size and character.

Mr. ATKINS. Why not say the same size and material?

Mr. REED. I am willing to modify my amendment in that way. The Clerk will note the change.

Mr. ROBESON. Let it read "of the same size and like material."

Mr. REED. I so modify the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. The only amendment I would make in the remarks of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] would be to insert after the word "iron," wherever used by him in regard to our future Navy, the words "or steel."

Mr. REED. I meant to include both.

Mr. RANDALL. I think that the Navy of the future is to be of steel.

Mr. REED. I believe that after this explanation the amendment will commend itself to the good sense of the House as the only practical thing that can be done in the anomalous circumstances in which we find ourselves.

Mr. HISCOCK. The amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] is accepted by the Committee on Appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. It cannot be accepted unless by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Objection was made.

The CHAIRMAN proceeded to put the question on agreeing to the amendment of Mr. REED, and it was declared agreed to.

Mr. COBB. I call for a division.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the proposition will be read again.

Mr. ATKINS. Let it go over with the other propositions connected with this subject.

Mr. REED. That would only complicate matters. This is an amendment which no one ought to object to.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let me appeal to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBB.] We desire this shall be treated as a committee amendment, just as if it were a part of the original bill. We ought to be allowed to do that.

A MEMBER. And debate it afterward?

Mr. COBB. I may be wrong in my understanding of this matter; but as I understand, the bill in its present form limits the expenditure on these vessels by the Bureau of Construction and Repair to $400,000. The amendment of the gentleman from Maine I believe removes that limitation.

Mr. REED. But it provides a more proper limitation, which is that no money shall be spent in repairing any vessel where the cost will be more than 30 per cent. of the cost of building a new ship.

Mr. COBB. I understood that provision was already in the bill.

Mr. REED. No, sir. And this is a practical limitation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist on a vote.

Mr. REED. We cannot ascertain beforehand how much is needed, but we can intelligently say beforehand we will not repair a vessel which will cost more than 30 per cent., and I submit that is a practical amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. It does not say 30 per cent. of the original cost.

Mr. BERRY. Thirty per cent. of the value.

Mr. REED. As to the phrase "value" I should not know what it meant.

Mr. HISCOCK. The Secretary of the Navy agrees to this suggestion.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. REED.]

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 48, noes 5.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN appointed Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. REED as tellers.

Mr. ROBESON. I now renew my proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is dividing.

Mr. ROBESON. I ask by unanimous consent to make a suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. ROBESON. My proposition is to pass over the provisions in regard to these two Bureaus of Construction and Repair and Steam-Engineering for the present, and allow the Clerk to read the rest of the bill, about which there is no question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there unanimous consent?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is understood that the amendment of the gentleman from Maine was not adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. It was neither rejected nor adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVAL ACADEMY.

For pay of professors and others: For two professors, heads of departments, namely, one of mathematics and one of chemistry, at $2,500 each; three professors, (assistants,) namely, one of physics, one of Spanish, and one of English studies, history, and law, at $2,200 each; six assistant professors, namely, four of French, one of English studies, history, and laws, and one of drawing, at $1,800 each; swordmaster at $1,500, and two assistants at $1,000 each; boxing-master and gymnast at $1,200; assistant librarian at $1,400; secretary of the Naval Academy, $1,800; three clerks to Superintendent at $1,200, $1,000, and $800, respectively; one clerk to commandant of cadets, $1,200; one clerk to paymaster, $1,000; one dentist, $1,600; one baker, $600; one mechanic in department of physics and chemistry, $730; one messman, $288; one cook, $325.50; one messenger to Superintendent, $600; one armorer, $529.50; one gunner's mate, $469.50, and one quarter-gunner, $409.50; one cockswain, $469.50; one seaman in the department of seamanship, one seaman in the department of astronomy, and one seaman in the department of physics and chemistry, at $349.50 each; one bandmaster, $528; twenty-one first-class musicians at $348 each; seven second-class musicians at $300 each; in all, $52,506.

Mr. ROBESON. I move, on page 19, line 452, to strike out the words "heads of departments."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For necessary repairs of public buildings, pavements, wharves, and walls inclosing the grounds of the Naval Academy, and for improvements, repairs, and furniture and fixtures, $21,000.

Mr. TALBOTT. I move to insert the following at the end of line 528:

For the repair of the naval hospital building at Annapolis, $2,000.

Mr. ROBESON. There is no objection to that amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why, we have here $21,000 for the necessary repairs of public buildings, &c.; and that has been a standing appropriation for a number of years for this purpose. I do not see the necessity for the amendment, and hope it will be rejected.

Mr. TALBOTT. No money has been appropriated for this purpose at all. The Committee on Naval Affairs last February were at Annapolis, and their attention was called to this by the Superintendent, Captain Ramsay. The building cost $150,000. It has been used but once or twice; and they have but one or two persons there. The Superintendent stated the building was going to decay and about $2,000 was required to put it in order. He wrote me a communication asking for $2,000, and it was referred to the committee.

Mr. BLOUNT. If we have no use for it had we not better sell it?

Mr. TALBOTT. It will sell for more if we repair it. The communication I referred to was called to the attention of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and that committee sent it to the Committee on Appropriations with the recommendation that the appropriation should be included in this bill. I will modify the amendment so as to provide for $2,000 for the repair of this building.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems this building is unnecessary for any purpose of the Academy. If it is necessary to repair it, we have $21,000 for that purpose in this item.

Mr. TALBOTT. But none of that is for this building.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is for the repair of public buildings, walls, wharves, &c., at the Academy.

Mr. TALBOTT. That is for buildings at the Naval Academy, but this is on the Government farm. It is true, and I will admit it, that building is seldom used, but if it is the policy of the Government to keep it up, it should be kept in repair.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is manifestly a building that is not required.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy, as soon as may be after the passage of this act, to cause an account to be taken of the stock of stores and supplies pertaining and belonging to the several bureaus of the Navy Department, in which account shall be stated the original cost of each article and the date of purchase, so far as the same is known, and cause an appraisement of the present value of such stores and supplies to be made and entered in such account; and said appraised value, when so entered, shall hereafter be the price at which they shall be charged in accounting with the several bureaus. Such appraisal shall be made by boards of officers of the Navy to be designated by the Secretary; and all such stores and supplies as shall be found by boards of appraisers to be unserviceable for use in the Navy shall be condemned and sold in the manner hereinafter provided for the sale of old materials, and the proceeds thereof, after deducting the cost of such appraisal, condemnation, and sale, shall be paid into the Treasury.

It shall also be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy, as soon as may be after the passage of this act, to cause to be examined by competent boards of officers of the Navy, to be designated by him for that duty, all vessels belonging to the Navy not in actual service at sea, and vessels at sea as soon as practicable after they shall return to the United States, and hereafter all vessels on their return from foreign stations, and all vessels in the United States as often as once in three years when practicable; and said boards shall ascertain and report to the Secretary of the Navy, in writing, which of said vessels are unfit for further service, or, if the same are unfinished in any navy-yard, those which cannot be finished without great and disproportionate expense, and shall in such report state fully the grounds and reasons for their opinion. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy, if he shall concur in opinion with said report, to strike the name of such vessel or vessels from the Navy Register. And such vessels shall thereupon be appraised in such manner as the Secretary of the Navy may approve. And if the said Secretary shall deem it for the best interest of the United States to sell any such vessel or vessels, he shall advertise for sealed proposals for the purchase of the same, for a period not less than three months, in such newspapers as other naval advertisements are published, setting forth the name and location and the appraised value of such vessel, and that the same will be sold for cash to the person or persons or corporations offering the highest price therefor above the appraised value thereof; and such proposals shall be opened on a day and hour and at a place named in said advertisement, and record thereof shall be made.

The Secretary of the Navy shall require to accompany each bid or proposal a deposit in cash of not less than 25 per cent. of the amount of the offer or proposal, and also a bond, with two or more sureties, to be approved by him, conditioned for the payment of the remaining 75 per cent. of the amount of such offer or proposal within the time fixed in the advertisement. And in case default is made in the payment of the remaining 75 per cent. or any part thereof, the Secretary, within the prescribed time thereof, shall advertise and resell said vessel under the provisions of this act. And in that event said cash deposit of 25 per cent. shall be considered as forfeited to the Government, and shall be applied first to the payment of all costs and expenditures attending the advertisement and resale of said vessel; second, to the payment of the difference, if any, between the first and last sale of said vessel; and the balance, if any, shall be covered into the Treasury: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent a suit upon said bond for breach of any of its conditions.

Any vessel sold under the foregoing provisions shall be delivered to the purchaser upon the full payment to the Secretary of the Navy of the amount of such proposal or offer; and the net proceeds of such sale shall be covered into the Treasury. But no vessel of the Navy shall hereafter be sold in any other manner than herein provided, or for less than such appraised value, unless the President of the United States shall otherwise direct in writing. No old material of the Navy shall hereafter be sold or exchanged by the Secretary of the Navy, or by any officer of the Navy, which can be profitably used by reworking or otherwise in the construction or repair of vessels, their machinery, armor, armament, or equipment; but the same shall be stored and preserved for future use. When any such old material cannot be profitably used as aforesaid, the same shall be appraised and sold at public auction, under such rules and regulations and in such manner as the said Secretary may direct. The net proceeds arising from the sales of such old material shall be paid into the Treasury. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy annually to report in detail to Congress, in his annual report, the proceeds of all sales of vessels and materials made under the provisions of this act, and the expenses attending such sales. In case any vessel now in process of construction in any navy-yard is found to be unworthy of being completed, and shall be condemned under the provisions of this act, which cannot properly be sold, and it becomes necessary to remove the same, the cost of such removal shall be paid out of the net proceeds derived from the sale of other vessels hereby authorized to be sold.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. In obedience to a promise I made to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] I move, in line 40, to strike out "three" and insert "four," so the advertisement should be for four instead of three months.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I ask to print two amendments in the RECORD, which I shall move when this bill is again taken up for consideration.

Amendments proposed to be offered by Mr. B. W. HARRIS:

BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR.

For preservation and completion of vessels on the stocks and in ordinary; purchase of materials and stores of all kinds; labor in navy-yards and on foreign stations; preservation of materials; purchase of tools; wear, tear, and repair of vessels afloat, and for general care, increase, and protection of the Navy in the line of construction and repair, and incidental expenses, namely, advertising and foreign postage, $5,000,000: Provided, That four millions of said appropriation may be applied toward the construction of two cruising vessels of war, the same to be constructed of steel, of domestic manufacture, having a tensile strength of not less than 55,000 pounds to the square inch, and a ductility in eight inches of not less than 25 per cent.; said vessels to be provided with full sail-power and full steam-power.

One of said vessels shall be of not less than five thousand nor more than six thousand tons displacement, and shall have the highest attainable speed, and shall be armed with not more than four breech-loading rifled cannon, of high power, of not less than 8-inch caliber, or two of 10-inch caliber, and not more than twenty-one breech-loading rifled cannon, of high power, of not less than 6-inch caliber; one of said vessels shall be of not less than four thousand three hundred nor more than four thousand seven hundred tons displacement, and shall have the highest attainable speed, and shall be armed with four breech-loading rifled cannon, of high power, of not less than 8-inch caliber, or two of 10-inch caliber, and not more than fifteen breech-loading rifled cannon, of high power, of not less than 6-inch caliber, one steam-ram, having a displacement of not more than 2,000 tons, to have an average speed at sea of not less than thirteen knots per hour, and to be constructed of steel of the quality and kind hereinbefore designated; and two torpedo gun-boats of not less than four hundred and fifty tons displacement, having an average sea speed of not less than thirteen knots per hour, and the fullest maneuvering power, and capable of carrying each one breech-loading rifled gun, of high power, of not less than 10-inch caliber.

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby empowered and directed to organize a board of naval officers and experts for his advice and assistance, to be called the "naval board of advice and survey," to serve during the period required for the construction, armament, and trial of the vessels hereby authorized to be constructed, and no longer. Said board shall consist of five officers on the active list of the Navy in the line and the staff, to be detailed by the Secretary of the Navy, without reference to rank and with reference only to character, experience, knowledge, and skill, and two persons of established reputation and standing, experts in science and in the arts of ship-building, steam-engineering, and naval ordnance, to be selected from civil life and employed for this sole duty by the Secretary of the Navy, and to be paid such sum, out of the appropriation hereby made, not exceeding $50,000, as he may direct: Provided, however, That no person shall be a member of said board who has any interest, direct or indirect, in any invention, device, or process, patented or otherwise, to be used in the construction of said vessels, their engines, boilers, or armament.

It shall be the duty of said board to advise and assist the Secretary of the Navy, in his office or elsewhere, in all matters referred to them by him relative to the designs, models, plans, specifications, and contracts for said vessels in all their parts, and relative to the materials to be used therein and to the construction thereof, and especially relative to the harmonious adjustment, respectively, of their hulls, machinery, and armament; and they shall examine all materials to be used in said vessels, and inspect the work on the same as it progresses, and have general supervision thereof, under the direction of said Secretary. But said board shall have no power to make or enter into any contract, nor to direct or control any officer of the Navy, the chief of any bureau of the Navy, or any contractor, but shall in all things be subject to the order and direction of said Secretary.

Neither of the vessels hereby authorized to be built shall be contracted for or commenced until full and complete detail drawings and specifications thereof in all its parts, including the hull, engines, and boilers, shall have been provided or adopted by the Navy Department, and shall have been approved, in writing, by said board, or by a majority of the members thereof, and by the Secretary of the Navy; and after said drawings and specifications have been provided, adopted, and approved as aforesaid, and the work has been commenced or a contract made for it, they shall not be changed in any respect, when the cost of such change shall in the construction exceed $100, except upon the approval of said board, or a majority of the members thereof, in writing, and upon the written order of the Secretary of the Navy; and if changes are thus made, the actual cost thereof and the damage caused thereby shall be ascertained, estimated, and determined by said board; and in any contract made pursuant to this act it shall be provided in the terms thereof that the contractor shall be bound by the determination of said board, or a majority thereof, as to the amount of the increased or diminished compensation said contractor shall be entitled to receive, if any, in consequence of such change or changes.

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to cause either or any of the six cruising vessels of war aforesaid to be provided with interior deflective steel armor, if the same, upon full investigation, shall seem to be practicable and desirable, and if the same shall be approved by said board, or a majority thereof, in writing. Before any of the vessels hereby authorized shall be contracted for or commenced, the Secretary of the Navy shall, by proper notice, invite all engineers and mechanics of established reputation, and all reputable manufacturers of vessels, steam-engines, boilers, and ordnance, having or controlling regular establishments and being engaged in the business, all officers of the Navy, and especially all naval constructors, steam-engineers, and ordnance officers of the Navy, having plans, models, or designs of any vessels of the classes hereby authorized, or of any part thereof, within any given period, not exceeding sixty days, to submit the same to said board; and it shall be the duty of said board to carefully and fully examine the same and to hear any proper explanation thereof, and to report to the Secretary of the Navy, in writing, whether, in their opinion, any such plan, model, or design, or any suggestion therein, is worthy of adoption in the construction of said vessels, their engines, boilers, or armament; and if in such construction any such plan, model, design, or suggestion shall be adopted, for the use of which any citizen not an officer of the Navy would have a just claim for compensation, the Secretary of the Navy shall report the facts to Congress, with a statement of the amount which in his opinion should be paid to such person.

For the civil establishment, $40,000.

BUREAU OF STEAM-ENGINEERING.

For repairs, completion, and preservation of machinery and boilers in vessels on the stocks and in ordinary; purchase and preservation of all materials and stores and patent rights; purchase, fitting, and repair of machinery and tools in the navy-yards and stations; wear, tear, and repair of machinery and boilers of naval vessels; incidental expenses, such as foreign postages, telegrams, advertising, freight, photographing, books, and instruments, $2,200,000: Provided, That $1,000,000 of the above amount shall be applied by the Secretary of the Navy to the following objects, namely: to building and fitting the turrets and pilot-house of the iron-clad steamer Miantonomoh; to the launching to the best advantage of the iron-clad steamers Monadnock, Puritan, Amphitrite, and Terror; and to the completion of the engines and machinery of said vessels as he may on examination think most expedient and best for the interests of the service.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to make a pro forma amendment, to strike out, in lines 74 and 75 of this section, the words "unless the President of the United States shall otherwise direct in writing."

Now, this provision of the bill allows vessels of the Navy, condemned or otherwise useless, to be sold for not less than their appraised value, unless the President of the United States shall otherwise direct in writing. Inasmuch as the provisions of this paragraph present a well-considered limitation upon the mode of proceeding with the sale of these vessels, it does not seem to me to be the part of wisdom to divide the responsibility. I think it better it should rest entirely upon the Secretary or upon the head of the Department instead of allowing a division of the responsibility, as these words which I have quoted would indicate.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. If the gentleman will allow me, I will explain the reason for that in a moment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the gentleman from New Jersey in charge of the bill will see the propriety of omitting these words.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Under existing law the President can order the sale of any ship of the Navy in any part of the world. This is a power that is already lodged in his hands. Now, the section of the bill under consideration provides that no ship shall be hereafter sold without an appraisal, and not then for less than the appraised value. I anticipate, therefore, that it would sometimes happen, or a case would arise, where a ship had been appraised and offered for sale and nobody had bid its appraised value, in such case it will remain upon the hands of the Government, unless provision is made to meet such a case. This provision simply allows that the President shall have it in his power to say that if the appraised value cannot be obtained it may be sold for a less value, and that is the only purpose of this provision.

Mr. HOLMAN. That does not seem to be a sufficient answer for retaining these words in the bill——

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. But the gentleman from Indiana will see that if you cannot get a bid equal to the amount of the appraisement it must be left upon the hands of the Government, for the Secretary cannot sell it under the law for less than that value. I think the President should have power to direct its sale at a less price than the appraised value.

Mr. HOLMAN. In such a case, if it should arise, I apprehend that under the general power given to the Secretary of the Navy he could order a reappraisal of the vessel.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. That might be possible.

Mr. HOLMAN. The President of the United States in all such cases would act under the advice of the Secretary of the Navy. It will be far better to recommend the reappraisement of the property than to allow a departure from the rule here laid down. I think it will be far better, Mr. Chairman, to adhere to the text just as it is, omitting the extraordinary power proposed to be conferred upon the President in contravention of the general provisions of the bill.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. My purpose is this, and I am not tenacious of my views upon this point. I only want to secure a sale of the vessels which may be desirable in the best manner; but if the gentleman from Indiana insists upon his amendment, I shall not object to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana insist upon his amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. I would rather have the amendment adopted; I think it is an anomalous feature of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman stated that he offered a pro forma amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did, but I now offer an amendment to strike out the words which I have indicated after the word value, in line 74.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in lines 74 and 75, the words "unless the President of the United States shall otherwise direct in writing."

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes not counted.

So (no further count being insisted upon) the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBESON. I now renew the motion that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAGE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6616) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, had come to no conclusion thereon.

INDEX TO THE JOURNALS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, with respect to the printing of the index of the Journals of Congress as far as it has been completed.

The SPEAKER. The report of the committee will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to whom is committed the preparation of a general index of the Journals of Congress, submit the following report of the progress that has been made in the work:

Since the last report of the committee the index of the Journals of the Eleventh, Twelfth, Thirteenth, Fourteenth, Fifteenth, and Sixteenth Congresses, embracing the period from 1809 to 1821, has been completed, and is submitted herewith.

Sufficient progress has been made to indicate that at the next session of Congress we shall be able to report the index completed from the Seventeenth to the Twenty-fifth Congresses, which, under the original plan of the committee, will enable the publication of the first volume of the index to embrace the first fifty years of the existence of the Government.

We recommend that the index accompanying this report be printed, in order that it may be subjected to the revision necessary before its final publication.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD, and the index as far as completed ordered to be printed.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

RAILROAD BRIDGE ACROSS SAULT SAINTE MARIE RIVER.

Mr. HUBBELL. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and put upon its passage the bill (S. No. 121) to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across the Sault Sainte Marie River. If the House will indulge me one moment I will make a brief explanation, and I think there will be no objection to the passage of the bill, which makes provision for an international bridge across the rapids of the Sault Sainte Marie River. It was introduced in the Senate and referred to the Secretary of War, who made certain suggestions as to amendments, which were adopted by the Senate. It was also referred to the Secretary of State, who examined the bill and suggested certain amendments, which were also adopted. The same bill was referred to the Committee on Commerce of the House, and they have reported unanimously in its favor.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be lawful for the Sault Sainte Marie Bridge Company, a corporation duly organized by and under the laws of the State of Michigan, whenever due authority shall have been given to any person or corporation by the Dominion of Canada, with the sanction of the British Government, to build or join in the building of a bridge for such purpose, to build a bridge across the Sainte Marie River at or near the rapids in said river, in Chippewa County, Michigan, for the use of and connection of railroads whose business crosses or will cross the river at said locality, and whose lines of road are now or may hereafter approach the river at that place; and that, when constructed, all the trains of all the roads terminating at said river at that place, or opposite thereto, shall be allowed to cross the said bridge, for reasonable compensation to be made to the owners thereof, under the limitations and conditions hereinafter mentioned; and in case of litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of the said river within the waters of the United States, the cause may be tried before the district court of the United States of the State in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge touches.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of said Sault Sainte Marie Bridge Company, before entering upon the construction of said bridge, to submit to the Secretary of War, for his approval, a drawing and description fully showing the plan and location proposed for said bridge; and the construction thereof shall not be entered into until such approval of the plan and the location of the site of the bridge has been obtained.

SEC. 3. That any bridge constructed under the provisions of this act shall have one pivot draw-bridge over the ship-canal connecting lakes Huron and Superior, convenient for the passage of ships, vessels, and steamboats, and of the entire width of said canal, clear of all obstructions of every kind from said bridge, and twenty-five feet additional over the tow-path on either side whenever said draw is open, said draw-bridge to be of such length as to conform to these conditions; and the said bridge shall not be less than ten feet high above high-water mark in said canal, measuring to the bottom chord of the bridge; and the said draw shall be opened promptly, upon reasonable signal, for the passage of boats and vessels, except when trains are passing over the same, but in no case shall unnecessary delay occur in opening said draw during or after the passage of trains; and the operation or working of said draw-bridge shall at all times be under the supervision of the Secretary of War, and shall be subject to such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

SEC. 4. That any bridge constructed under this act, and according to its limitations, shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transportation over the same of the mails of the United States, or for passengers or freight passing over said bridge, than the rate per mile paid for their transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to said bridge.

SEC. 5. That said bridge company shall have the right to locate, hold, and possess said post-route and bridge and right of way for the width which the length of the draw-bridge will require for space to swing in. It shall also be lawful to place ice-breakers or piers above the said bridge in said river for the safety and protection of said bridge: Provided, That the rights of navigation and of private parties be in all cases respected.

SEC. 6. That any bridge constructed under the provisions of this act may be constructed not only for the purposes of railroad business, but also for travel of persons, horses, teams, and carriages, in which case the said company or corporation may charge reasonable toll therefor, subject to regulation and revision from time to time by the Secretary of War of the United States.

SEC. 7. That all railway companies desiring to use the said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges in the passage of the same, and in the use of the machinery and fixtures thereof, and of all approaches thereto, under and upon such reasonable terms and conditions and subject to such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War of the United States, upon hearing the allegations and proofs of the parties, in case the parties themselves be unable to agree: Provided, That the provisions of section 4 in regard to charges for passengers and freight across said bridge shall not govern the Secretary of War in determining any question arising as to the sum or sums to be paid to the owners of said bridge by said companies for the use of said bridge.

SEC. 8. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved; and the right to require any changes in said structure, or its entire removal, at the expense of the owners thereof, whenever Congress shall decide that the public interest requires it, is also expressly reserved.

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill is a very important measure. It not merely affects a locality, but is one of general interest. Still, if it is recommended by the Secretary of War——

Mr. HUBBELL. It is recommended by the Secretary of War. It was submitted to the Secretary of State and has his approval. It has been passed by the Senate, and it has been considered and approved by the House Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the report of the Secretary of War will go into the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the report of the committee, embracing the report of the Secretary of War and other papers, will be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The report of the House committee is as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6282) to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across the Sault Sainte Marie River, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report as follows:

The bill provides for or authorizes the construction of an international bridge across the Sainte Marie River, the boundary line between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, for the purpose of connecting the Canadian and the American systems of railroads.

The subject-matter of this bill has been referred to the Secretary of State and to the Secretary of War for their respective opinions and suggestions. Each of these gentlemen have approved of the same, with certain amendments suggested by them, all which amendments have been incorporated into this bill, and as now reported by this committee it is an exact copy of a similar bill which passed the Senate on June 2, 1882, at which time the amendments above referred to and suggested by the Secretaries of State and War, respectively, were adopted by the Senate, as will more fully appear by reference to the Senate proceedings of June 2, 1882, on page 17 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Your committee are informed that there are no serious objections from any quarter to the passage of this bill, and upon investigation are unable to develop any, and are well satisfied that it is sufficiently well guarded in all of its provisions to save harmless and protect not only the rights of the United States but also of all interests engaged in the commerce of that river and of the Great Lakes which it connects.

Your committee append hereto and make a part of their report letters from the Secretary of War, the Chief of Engineers, and the Secretary of State, addressed to Hon. S. J. R. MCMILLAN, chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce, for the better information of the House, and recommend the passage of the bill.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, January 30, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 12th instant, inclosing Senate bill No. 121, to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across Sainte Marie River, Michigan, and a draft of joint resolution (S. R. No. 1) on the same subject, with request that the views of this Department thereon may be communicated to you.

In reply I beg to invite your attention to the inclosed report of the Chief of Engineers, to whom your letter was referred, and to state that the recommendations of that officer therein contained meet my approval.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
Secretary of War.

Hon. S. J. R. MCMILLAN,
Chairman Committee on Commerce, United States Senate.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C., January 26, 1882.

SIR: In reply to the reference of a letter of the 12th instant from Hon. S. J. R. MCMILLAN, chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce, inclosing Senate bill No. 121, to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across Sainte Marie River, Michigan, and a draft of joint resolution (S. R. No. 1) on the same subject, with request on behalf of the committee for such suggestions and recommendations as may be deemed proper, I beg leave to suggest that the bill be amended so as to provide that the location of the site where the bridge would cross the canal should be approved by the Secretary of War before the company is permitted to enter upon its construction, and that the draw-bridge (provided for in section 2) when opened should leave a clear distance of twenty-five feet, instead of eight, on either side from the nearest bank of the canal, and that the tow-path for this width should be clear of obstructions of every kind; and further, that the operation (or working) of the draw-bridge should be subject to such rules and supervision as the Secretary of War may prescribe.

With regard to the resolution (S. R. No. 1) I would suggest that the convening of a board of engineers, as therein provided, should be amended so as to make it discretionary with the Secretary of War instead of obligatory, as perhaps the assembling of such a board may not be found necessary when the precise location of the bridge by the company is submitted for approval as suggested.

The above amendments will be found upon the accompanying copy of the bill.

The communication of Hon. Mr. MCMILLAN, with its inclosures, is herewith returned.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. G. WRIGHT,
Chief of Engineers, Brigadier and Brevet Major-General.

Hon. ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
Secretary of War.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 24, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 11th instant. It is accompanied by a copy of Senate bill No. 121, entitled "A bill to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across the Sainte Marie River," (with proposed amendments by the committee,) and requests suggestions upon the subject, especially with reference to any conflict between the provisions of the bill and treaty stipulations between the United States and any foreign power.

In reply I have the honor to state that Congress may be regarded as having the right to authorize the bridge so far as it may extend over land or water within the jurisdiction of the United States. This jurisdiction, however, is understood to be limited to the middle of the River Saint Mary's. In order lawfully to extend the structure beyond that limit it is supposed that it would be advisable and necessary to obtain not only the permission of the Canadian Government, but that also of Great Britain, the sovereign of the region north of the lakes and of their connections, recognized as such by the United States in the articles relating to the boundary in the treaties of 1783, 1794, 1814, and 1842, and in the decisions of the commissioners thereunder.

In regard to the bill itself, allow me to suggest that in section 1, line 5, the words "shall have been" be substituted for "is," and in line 6, after the words "Dominion of Canada," insert "with the sanction of the British Government." In section 4, line 5, I would omit the words "troops and munitions of war" as not being necessary for us and as not likely to be regarded with favor by the other parties.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

FREDK. T. FRELINGHUYSEN.

Hon. S. J. R. MCMILLAN,
Chairman of the Committee on Commerce, United States Senate.

The bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

Mr. HUBBELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] is recognized.

Mr. COBB. I move that the House do now adjourn.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

Mr. PEIRCE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 3831) to create a district for the inspection of hulls and boilers of steam-vessels; and

A bill (H. R. No. 6519) to authorize the construction of bridges over the rivers Saint Mary's, Satella, Little Satella, and Crooked, in the States of Georgia and Florida.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. VAN AERNAM, for two days, Saturday and Monday, July 1 and 3.

To Mr. MACKEY, for six days.

To Mr. SHACKELFORD, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. WEBBER, until the 5th instant.

HEIRS OF LOIS L. WEEKS.

On motion of Mr. DINGLEY, by unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 5434) for the relief of the heirs of Lois L. Weeks, reported adversely by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, was taken from the table and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. BOWMAN, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Robert Chisolm, referred to the Committee on Claims, there being no adverse report thereon.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. BLANCHARD, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD some remarks on Senate bill No. 750. [See Appendix.]

Mr. DINGLEY, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD some remarks on the joint resolution (H. R. No. 250) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue 2 per cent. bonds and certificates in exchange for bonds bearing a higher rate of interest. [See Appendix.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBB,] that the House do now adjourn. The Chair will state there is on the Speaker's table a message received from the President of the United States vetoing an important bill. The Chair would suggest that the message ought to be read.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] to withdraw his motion, to let the veto message be read.

Mr. COBB. I insist on my motion.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was not agreed to.

EXPORT TAX ON TOBACCO.

Mr. TUCKER. I ask that by unanimous consent the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3854) to repeal so much of section 3385 of the Revised Statutes as imposes an export tax on tobacco, and that it be put upon its passage.

This is a bill which we asked to propose as an amendment to the internal-revenue bill the other day. It is for the repeal of export tax on tobacco, and is the unanimous report of the Committee on Ways and Means. It was ruled out as an amendment because there was a bill on the Calendar substantially the same as the amendment proposed.

Mr. WHITE. I call attention to the fact that this gives no relief to the farmer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ANDERSON. I object at present.

Mr. TUCKER. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. ANDERSON. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the present consideration of the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 3385 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act approved June 8, 1880, be amended and re-enacted so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3385. Manufactured tobacco, snuff, and cigars intended for immediate exportation may, after being properly inspected, marked, and branded, be removed from the manufactory in bond without having affixed thereto the stamps indicating the payment of the tax thereon. The removal of such tobacco, snuff, and cigars from the manufactory shall be made under such regulations, and after making such entries, and executing and filing with the collector of the district from which the removal is to be made such bonds and bills of lading, and giving such other additional security as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. There shall be affixed to each package of tobacco, snuff, and cigars intended for immediate export, before it is removed from the manufactory, an engraved stamp indicative of such intention. Such stamp shall be provided and furnished to the several collectors as in the case of other stamps, and they shall account for the use of the same. When the manufacturer has made the proper entries, filed the bonds, and otherwise complied with the requirements of law and the regulations as herein provided, the collector shall issue to him a permit for the removal, accurately describing the tobacco, snuff, and cigars to be shipped, the number and kinds of packages, the number of pounds, the marks and brands, the State and collection district from which the same are shipped, the number of the manufactory and the manufacturer's name, the port from which the said tobacco, snuff, and cigars are to be exported, and the route or routes over which the same are to be sent to the port of shipment. Upon the presentation to the collector of internal revenue of a detailed report from the inspectors of customs and a certificate of the collector of customs at the port from which the goods are to be exported that the goods removed from the manufactory under bond and described in the permit of the collector of internal revenue have been received by the said collector of customs, and that the said goods were duly laden on board of a foreign-bound vessel, naming the vessel, and that the said merchandise was entered on the outward manifest of said vessel, and that the said vessel and cargo were duly cleared from said port, and on the payment of the tax or deficiency, if any, the bonds which have been given or shall hereafter be required to be given under the provisions of this section shall be canceled. Every person who, with the intent to defraud the revenue laws of the United States, relands or causes to be relanded within the jurisdiction of the United States any manufactured tobacco, snuff, or cigars which have been shipped for exportation under the provisions of this act, without properly entering such tobacco, snuff, or cigars at the custom-house, and paying the proper customs and internal-revenue tax thereon, or who receives such relanded tobacco, snuff, or cigars, and every person who aids or abets in such relanding or receiving such tobacco, snuff, or cigars, shall, on conviction, be fined not exceeding $5,000, or imprisoned not more than three years, and all tobacco, snuff, or cigars so relanded shall be forfeited to the United States."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

Mr. TUCKER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and I also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. ANDERSON. I call for a division. I would like to know something about the bill.

Several MEMBERS. Too late.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kansas rise?

Mr. ANDERSON. I rise for the purpose of raising the point of no quorum on the passage of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the motion to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN NATIONAL LIBRARY ASSOCIATION.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for consideration at this time Senate bill No. 2033, to authorize the sale of certain lands in the city of Hot Springs, Arkansas, to the Woman's Christian National Library Association.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Woman's Christian National Library Association, incorporated under the laws of the State of Arkansas, be authorized and entitled to enter and purchase, within six months next after the passage of this act, for the reserved purposes of such association, lots numbered 11 and 12 in block numbered 127 in the city of Hot Springs, Arkansas, now subject to sale under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, by paying to the receiver of public moneys at the land office at Little Rock, Arkansas, at the assessed value of said lots as placed thereon by the commissioners appointed under the acts of 1877 and 1878.

Mr. HENDERSON. I would like to inquire why it is that these lots cannot be purchased now, without the passage of this bill?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. They are in the reservation.

Mr. HENDERSON. But the bill itself says that the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to sell them.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. This bill is to authorize him to sell these particular lots to this association.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Some one should explain the size of the lots, tell us something about them. We do not know what we are voting on at all.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. These are two small lots, and this association desire to erect a building on them in the town of Hot Springs. This Woman's Christian National Library Association is composed of benevolent ladies.

Mr. ATKINS. Is there any appraised value fixed on the land?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I do not know of any value.

Mr. CRAVENS. I can explain all about this bill. There was a bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands of the House donating outright these lots to this association. The lots are valued at $50 each. There is about to be a sale of the lots, and in order to hasten up the matter this bill was passed through the Senate, authorizing the association to purchase these lots at the appraised value of $50 each, and it is now asked that that Senate bill be passed instead of the House bill, which proposed to donate these lots outright to this association.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that it has received communications from various persons on this subject.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read three several times, and passed.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONDEMNED CANNON FOR MONUMENTAL PURPOSES.

Mr. COBB. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for consideration at this time Senate bill No. 2068, authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the Jeff. C. Davis Post No. 16 of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Vincennes, Indiana, six condemned cast-iron guns, for monumental purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to deliver to Captain W. D. Lewis, for the use of the Jeff. C. Davis Post No. 16 of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Vincennes, Indiana, six condemned cast-iron cannon to be used for monumental purposes.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read three several times, and passed.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. ERRETT. I desire to call up a bill for consideration at this time.

Mr. AINSLIE. I would like to get a little bill through for the Territories that has no appropriation in it.

GEORGE G. COBB.

Mr. ERRETT. I desire to take from the Private Calendar the bill (H. R. No. 5536) to reissue a Treasury draft originally issued to George G. Cobb, an assistant assessor in Alabama, deceased, to J. E. Cobb, custodian of the minor children of said decedent.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which objections will be in order.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas on the 18th of May, 1871, United States Treasury draft numbered 5468, on the assistant treasurer of the United States at New York, was issued to George G. Cobb, late an assistant assessor, for the payment of $432.95; and

Whereas no administrator has been appointed on the estate of said deceased, and his heirs desire that payment should be made to a trustee for their benefit: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the Treasurer of the United States be and is required to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to J. E. Cobb, of Tuskegee, Alabama, the sum of $432.95 in trust for the use and benefit of the children and heirs of said George G. Cobb, deceased, and that payment shall be in full satisfaction and discharge of the Treasury draft aforesaid.

Mr. ERRETT. This draft was originally issued to George G. Cobb, an assistant assessor in the State of Alabama. Before it reached him he died, leaving a number of minor children. Those children are now scattered in different States, and it is supposed that the expense of administering upon the estate in three different States would eat up the entire proceeds of the draft. He left no other estate, and it is proposed, for the benefit of these minor children, to reissue the draft to the uncle of the children.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Private Calendar, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ERRETT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must insist now upon my motion that the House adjourn. It is quite late Saturday evening.

Mr. AINSLIE. I have a little bill for the Territories which I want to get through; it has no appropriation in it.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 96 for the relief of Joseph Conrad, of Missouri.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist upon the regular order.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. This is a bill for the benefit of a man who was shot all to pieces.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] insist upon his call for the regular order?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do.

VETO MESSAGE—CARRYING PASSENGERS BY SEA.

The SPEAKER. There is a message from the President of the United States vetoing a bill which has been passed. The message will be read, if there is no objection.

There was no objection; and the message was read, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

Herewith I return House bill No. 2744, entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers by sea," without my approval. In doing this I regret that I am not able to give my assent to an act which has received the sanction of the majority of both Houses of Congress.

The object proposed to be secured by the act is meritorious and philanthropic. Some correct and accurate legislation upon this subject is undoubtedly necessary. Steamships that bring large bodies of emigrants must be subjected to strict legal enactments, so as to prevent the passengers from being exposed to hardship and suffering; and such legislation should be made as will give them abundance of space and air and light, protecting their health by affording all reasonable comforts and conveniences, and by providing for the quantity and quality of the food to be furnished, and all of the other essentials of roomy, safe, and healthful accommodations in their passage across the sea.

A statute providing for all this is absolutely needed, and in the spirit of humane legislation must be enacted. The present act, by most of its provisions, will obtain and secure this protection for such passengers, and were it not for some serious errors contained in it would be most willingly approved by me.

My objections are these: in the first section, in lines from 13 to 24, inclusive, it is provided "that the compartments or spaces," &c., "shall be of sufficient dimensions to allow for each and any passenger," &c., "a hundred cubic feet, if the compartment or space is located on the first deck next below the uppermost deck of the vessel," &c., "or one hundred and twenty cubic feet for each passenger," &c., "if the compartment or space is located on the second deck below the uppermost deck of the vessels," &c. "It shall not be lawful to carry or bring passengers on any deck other than the two decks mentioned," &c.

Nearly all of the new and most of the improved ocean steamers have a spar-deck, which is above the main deck. The main deck was in the old style of steamers the only uppermost deck. The spar-deck is a comparatively new feature of the large and costly steamships, and is now practically the uppermost deck. Below this spar-deck is the main deck. Because of the misuse of the words "uppermost deck" instead of the use of the words "main deck," by this act the result will be to exclude nearly all of the large steamships from carrying passengers anywhere but on the main deck and on the deck below, which is the steerage deck, and to leave the orlop, or lower deck, heretofore used for passengers, useless and unoccupied by passengers. This objection, which is now presented in connection with others that will be presently explained, will, if this act is enforced, as it is now phrased, render useless for passenger traffic and expose to heavy loss all of the great ocean steam lines; and it will also hinder emigration, as there will not be ships enough that could accept these conditions to carry all who may now wish to come.

The use of the new and the hitherto unknown term "uppermost deck" creates this difficulty, and I cannot consent to have an abuse of terms like this to operate thus injuriously to these large fleets of ships. The passengers will not be benefited by such a statute, but emigration will be hindered, if not for a while almost prevented for many.

Again, the act in the first section, from line 31 to line 35 inclusive, provides: "And such passengers shall not be carried or brought in any between-decks, nor in any compartment," &c., "the clear height of which is less than seven feet." Between the decks of all ships are the beams; they are about a foot in width. The legal method of ascertaining tonnage for the purpose of taxation is to measure between the beams from the floor to the ceiling. If this becomes a law the space required would be eight feet from floor to ceiling, and this is impracticable, for in all ships the spaces between decks are adjusted in proportion to the dimensions of the ship; and if these spaces between decks are changed so as not to correspond in their proportions with the dimensions of the vessel the ship will not work well in the sea, her sailing qualities will be injured, and she will be rendered unfit for service.

It is only in great ships of vast tonnage that the height between decks can be increased. All the ordinary sized ships are necessarily constructed with seven feet space in the interval between the beams from the floor to the ceiling. To adopt this act, with this provision, would be to drive out of the service of transporting passengers most of all the steamships now in such trade, and no practical good obtained by it, for really, with the exception of the narrow beam the space between the decks is now seven feet. The purpose of the space commanded by the act is to obtain sufficient air and ventilation, and that is actually now given to the passenger by the seven feet that exists in all of these vessels between floor and ceiling.

There is also another objection that I must suggest. In section 12, from line 14 to line 24, it is provided: "Before such vessel shall be cleared or may lawfully depart, &c., the master of said vessel shall furnish, &c., a correct list of all passengers who have been or are intended to be taken on board the vessel, and shall specify," &c. This provision would prevent the clearing of the vessel. Steamvessels start at an appointed hour, and with punctuality. Down almost to the very hour of their departure, new passengers, other than those who have engaged their passage, constantly come on board. If this provision is to be the law they must be rejected, for the ship cannot, without incurring heavy penalties, take passengers whose names are not set forth on the list required before such vessel shall be cleared. They should be allowed to take such new passengers upon condition that they would furnish an additional list containing such persons' names. There are other points of objection of a minor character that might be presented for consideration if the bill could be reconsidered and amended, but the three that I have recited are conspicuous defects in a bill that ought to be a code for such a purpose, clear and explicit, free from all such objections. The practical result of this law would be to subject all of the competing lines of large ocean steamers to great losses. By restricting their carrying accommodations it would also stay the current of emigration that it is our policy to encourage as well as to protect. A good bill, correctly phrased, and expressing and naming in plain, well-known technical terms the proper and usual places and decks where passengers are and ought to be placed and carried, will receive my prompt and immediate assent as a public necessity.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 1, 1882.

Mr. HORR. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the House should adjourn now, will the consideration of this message go over as unfinished business? If so, I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The motion to refer is in order, but the motion to adjourn takes precedence, and the Chair thinks if the House should adjourn this matter would go over as unfinished business.

Mr. HOLMAN. I prefer that it should go over.

Mr. RANDALL. There is not now a quorum present.

OREGON SHORT-LINE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. AINSLIE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill No. 972, creating the Oregon Short-Line Railway Company a corporation in the Territories of Utah, Idaho, and Wyoming, and for other purposes.

Mr. HORR. What has been done with the veto message?

The SPEAKER. Nothing has been done with it. The Chair has stated that the motion to adjourn would take precedence of the motion to refer; and if the House should adjourn, the consideration of the veto message would go over as unfinished business. It is only by unanimous consent that the Chair can now entertain any other business.

Mr. AINSLIE. I hope there will be no objection to considering this bill. The Committee on the District of Columbia is allowed by this House two days every month; but the eight Territories of the United States are not allowed one day in the course of a year. This bill contains no appropriation. It is a very short bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (S. No. 972) creating the Oregon Short-Line Railway Company a corporation in the Territories of Utah, Idaho, and Wyoming, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand there are objections to this bill on the ground that this is not a bona fide corporation engaged in the construction of a railroad. Is that true?

Mr. AINSLIE. I can state the circumstances in a moment. The laws of Congress prohibit the Legislatures of the Territories from passing any act granting special privileges or franchises. The Legislature of Idaho, in passing the general incorporation act which it was authorized by the laws of Congress to pass, omitted the word "railroad." Hence this company was compelled to organize under the laws of the Territory of Wyoming. The Legislature of Idaho will not meet for about a year. This bill has already passed the Senate, and has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Railways and Canals.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Oregon Short-Line Railway Company, a corporation of that name duly incorporated and organized under the laws of the Territory of Wyoming, the amended articles of incorporation of which were duly filed in the office of the secretary of the said Territory on the 12th day of July, A. D. 1881, be, and the same is hereby, made a railway corporation in the Territories of Utah, Idaho, and Wyoming, under the same conditions and limitations and with the same rights and privileges that it now has and enjoys under said articles of incorporation within the said Territory of Wyoming, and with all the rights and privileges within said Territories of Wyoming, Utah, and Idaho which are secured to railway companies by the act of Congress approved the 3d day of March, A. D. 1875, entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States:" Provided, That the said corporation shall at all times hereafter be subject to all the laws and regulations in relation to railroads of the United States, or of any Territory or State through which its line of road may pass. And suits against said corporation may be instituted in the courts of said Territories, or either of them, having jurisdiction by the laws of such Territory.

SEC. 2. That Congress may at any time add to, alter, or repeal this act.

Mr. STONE. I object to the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. AINSLIE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection. There is nothing in the bill granting any money.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted, as follows:

To Mr. ATHERTON, until July 15, on account of important business;

To Mr. BLAND, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

WITDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the request which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SHALLENBERGER asks leave to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Mrs. Marian Haney.

Mr. HOLMAN. The other day, in a case where we granted permission to withdraw papers, they proved to be papers which the Committee on Claims had obtained from one of the Departments after considerable trouble; they were valuable papers, and there was no assertion that they were the property of the party filing the claim. When requests of this kind are made I shall insist it shall be shown satisfactorily to the House that there has been no adverse report and that the papers were filed by the party asking to withdraw them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that under the rules no order for the withdrawal of papers by a claimant would include papers belonging to the files of any Department.

Mr. RANDALL. I think we ought to revoke the action of the House in the case to which the gentleman refers. I quite agree that under an order of this kind no officer of the House would be justified in giving up papers belonging to one of the Departments; and I do not think that any officer who understood his duty would do so. But if this has been done there ought to be a revocation of the order.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. There are no such papers in this case, and there has been no adverse report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair repeats that an order authorizing any person to withdraw papers from the files would not allow him to take papers belonging to one of the Executive Departments.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not say that these papers belonged to an Executive Department; but they had been called for by the committee from one of the Departments, and they should not have been withdrawn from the files.

Mr. RANDALL. I think, if the gentleman is correct in his statement, he should pursue the matter further.

There being no objection, the leave requested by Mr. SHALLENBERGER was granted. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

SENATE.

MONDAY, July 3, 1882.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

FISHERIES REPORT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from Spencer F. Baird, United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, transmitting a special report upon the food fishes of the United States, with an account of the methods and apparatus by which they are captured, together with certain statistics of the American fisheries in general.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the communication be laid on the table, and that the question of printing it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered. The report does not accompany the letter. It will probably be received in the course of the day. When received the subject of printing will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of the operatives of different factories in Massachusetts engaged in the manufacture of knit goods, praying Congress "for the immediate correction of the error in the Revised Statutes by which knit goods are made subject to a much lower duty than the pound duty on raw wool," &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition from W. A. A. Carsey, president, and D. M. Lew, secretary, of Independent Labor party of the city of New York, praying Congress to raise the capitation tax on immigrants from 50 cents to $100 per head; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MORRILL presented a petition from 115 citizens of Vermont, praying for the confirmation of the call for a peace congress to be held in Washington, District of Columbia, November 22, 1882; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MAXEY presented a memorial of citizens of Titus County, Texas, in favor of the proposed Eads ship-railway across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MORGAN presented additional papers to accompany the bill (S. No. 2092) for the relief of Major W. R. King; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PREFERENCE OF DISABLED SOLDIERS.

Mr. HARRISON. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to submit a report on the resolution offered on the 16th of March by my colleague, [Mr. VOORHEES,] directing that committee to inquire into the enforcement by Departments of the Government of section 1754 of the Revised Statutes. I desire to state that this is the report of a majority of the committee. A minority dissented from the majority.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is the report of a majority of the committee. The Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] and myself, and probably one or two other members of the committee, did not consent to the report of the majority.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be printed, under the rule.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ASHEVILLE.

Mr. ROLLINS. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 996) to provide for the erection of public buildings at Asheville and Greensborough, North Carolina, to report it with an amendment.

Mr. RANSOM. I ask for the present consideration of that bill. I hope that there will be no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information, and it will be considered if there be no objection.

The ACTING SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and to insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the United States courts, post-office, and other offices of the Government at the town of Asheville, North Carolina. The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed for the site and building complete the sum of $50,000: Provided, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in any adjacent building by an open space of not less than fifty feet, including streets and alleys, and no appropriation for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of North Carolina shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same during the time the United States shall be or remain the owners thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

SEC. 2. That for the purposes herein indicated the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. MORRILL. There are two similar bills that will be, as I understand, favorably reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I think these bills ought to be taken up together whenever one of them is taken up.

Mr. MAXEY. I would like to inform the Senator from Vermont that there is a bill for a public building at Dallas, Texas, of great importance to us that I would be glad to have taken up this morning.

Mr. MORRILL. I understood that the committee were to report some other bills as soon as this or any similar bill was reported. Therefore I hope there will be no action taken on this bill this morning.

Mr. RANSOM. I trust that the Senator from Vermont will hear me a second. I am very anxious that this bill should pass. I hope no objection will be made to it.

Mr. COKE. I hope the Senator from Vermont will not object to this bill, and I hope the Texas bill will come in to-morrow morning. I am anxious to have the Texas bill passed, but I do not see any reason why it should interrupt the passage of this bill because the other one is not reported.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from North Carolina tell what the population of that town is?

Mr. RANSOM. It will have a very large population. It is a place of very great promise. I will inform the Senator from Massachusetts, if he will pardon me, on what I know is the point which he wishes to reach, that there is a very large amount of public business connected with the revenue done in that place. It is the center of a mountain country of a diameter of four hundred miles, and this will be the only public building in that area. It is destined to be a railroad center of great importance, and perhaps to be the first mountain city in the country.

Mr. HOAR. We have a town in Massachusetts which has no such building which is on a planet, the diameter of which is about 8,000 miles.

Mr. RANSOM. I will not discuss that question of geography or population this morning. I hope this bill will pass.

The amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the erection of a public building at Asheville, North Carolina."

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following concurrent resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to exchange, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, duplicate volumes of the Congressional Globe in his custody for volumes of which there may be a deficiency.

INDIAN CIVILIZATION FUND.

Mr. DAWES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to communicate to the Senate a detailed account of the Indian civilization fund, its origin, original and present amount, and in detail what portion, if any, of it has been expended.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 3854) to repeal so much of section 3385 of the Revised Statutes as imposes an export tax on tobacco; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5536) to reissue a Treasury draft, originally issued to George G. Cobb, an assistant assessor in Alabama, deceased, to J. E. Cobb, custodian of the minor children of said decedent.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 121) to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across the Sault Sainte Marie River;

A bill (S. No. 2033) to authorize the sale of certain lands in the city of Hot Springs, Arkansas, to the Woman's Christian National Library Association; and

A bill (S. No. 2068) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the Jeff. C. Davis Post No. 16 of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Vincennes, Indiana, six condemned cast-iron guns for monumental purposes.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6244) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

TIMBER ON INDIAN LANDS IN WISCONSIN.

Mr. DAWES. There is a little bill reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs which it is of great importance should be passed at an early day, if at all. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 2060) to authorize the sale of timber on certain lands reserved for the use of the Menomonee tribe of Indians, in the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions," the morning hour is closed. The Senator from Massachusetts asks for the consideration of the bill indicated by him. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] first moves that the deficiency appropriation bill be now taken up, and then he will give way to the Senator from Massachusetts, the Chair understands.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Maine consents to have Senate bill No. 2060 called up. I will state in a moment what it is.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which was read.

Mr. CONGER. From what committee is that bill reported?

Mr. DAWES. The bill comes from the Committee on Indian Affairs. I will state the purpose of the bill. There is a large tract of pine timber upon this reservation which is of no present use to the Indians. It is almost entirely grown timber, and a good deal of it is fallen. It is liable to be utterly destroyed by fire in any catastrophe of that kind which may occur. It was believed by the Indian Bureau and the Committee on Indian Affairs that it was wise to cut it off and convert it into a fund for the benefit of the Indians.

The bill has that purpose, and that only. Whether it is sufficiently guarded or not, those gentlemen like the Senator from Michigan and the Senators from Wisconsin, who are more familiar with that kind of business, can ascertain and determine better than I can myself. It provides, first, that the timber shall all be appraised in a manner under the control and direction of the Secretary of the Interior; that the proper notice shall be given, and then it may be sold at public auction at any amount above the appraisal. It further provides that if the Indians are of such character, and in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior it is feasible for them to do manual labor of this kind, the Indian agent may be authorized to cut off any portion of this timber himself, using the Indians as laborers, and convert it into money in that way—one or the other of these ways.

The object of the bill is to convert that timber, which is of no present use to the Indians, and which is liable to be destroyed at any moment, into a fund for the benefit of the Indians. I do not know myself whether the bill is sufficiently guarded or not, but I believe it is. It has received very careful attention from the Committee on Indian Affairs, and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] would himself have reported the bill had he been present.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin whether there is any restriction in this bill as to the amount of timber that may be sold to any one person, and if not, what would be the effect as to a beneficial sale of such a restriction if inserted in the bill?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It is provided in the bill that the sale shall be made in tracts not exceeding eighty acres, but any one person can purchase as many eighty-acre tracts as he chooses.

Mr. MCMILLAN. One person can buy as many of those tracts as he may see proper, if he pays more than anybody else.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Yes, if he pays more than any one else.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I should like to ask the Senator what would be the effect upon the sale of inserting a limitation in the bill as to the number of tracts that one person may buy, whether it would probably increase the value of the timber or not?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think it would decrease the value of the timber. My colleague [Mr. SAWYER] has experience in those matters, and he is of the opinion that it would decrease the amount for which the timber would sell. I think the bill is carefully guarded. It has received the approval of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the committee has considered it very carefully.

Mr. SAWYER. The object of the bill is to make a disposition of timber which is constantly going to waste, where fires run through, and the value of that timber, or a large amount of it, is constantly being wasted. I travel over that country every year; large fields have gone down by fire; and unless something is done very soon the Indians are going to lose the entire value of the timber. The bill provides that the timber shall be appraised and then offered for sale and sold at public auction at not less than the appraisal, and in quantities not exceeding eighty acres, so as to give every man who can buy eighty acres an opportunity to buy it. It is restricted as well as it can be. As my colleague well suggests, I think the tendency would be to get less for the timber than now if it were sold in large tracts.

The bill provides, further, that the Secretary of the Interior may sell a portion of the timber even if he cannot get what it is worth. He can sell a portion of it at a time or he can log it, just as he sees fit. I think it is a bill that ought to pass for the interest of the Indians.

Mr. CONGER. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs says this bill is carefully guarded, and in some respects it is; but I think the very provisions which are supposed to be safeguards here are the most dangerous that are in the bill. Some of them are unnecessary and are mere blinds, of no earthly consequence in the world, and those are the ones that seem to guard the bill most particularly.

Mr. SAWYER. I should like to say to my friend, if he will suggest anything that will make it more safe we shall be glad to accept it.

Mr. CONGER. I was about to say that the bill provides that the timber shall be sold, and that no timber less than a foot in diameter shall be sold. Of course, no lumberman will ever buy any such timber, less than a foot in diameter. If the bill required that in addition to the appraised value it would add to the safety and interest of the Indians. That is one point.

There is another provision, which to lumbermen seems the strangest provision in the world. What is it? That that part of the tree which is of no earthly use to anybody in lumbering, which is a damage to the land where it is left, shall be left. The hollow butt and the tops shall be left there, those things that cause fires to run.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That provision was put in by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and he insisted that it should remain in the bill.

Mr. CONGER. He ought to have had the advice of some gentlemen who understand lumbering.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. He had the advice of my colleague, and did not choose to take it.

Mr. SAWYER. I will state that that appeared to be a provision which did not do any good or any harm; but at the same time——

Mr. CONGER. Let me get through. If I can get rid of this lumberman's views on it, I can say what I want to.

When the timber that is over a foot in diameter is taken off, and when all the tops and refuse are left there, there is nothing to do but have the fire to run and destroy all the rest, as every lumberman knows. If there were a provision that the tops and waste should be burned up and destroyed, then it would be valuable; but for fear that there should be some such obligation upon the men lumbering to remove the waste, the causes of fire, this bill is made to prevent the necessity of their burning up or destroying that which furnishes the great fuel for all the great fires in the land. That is guarded—guarded not for the Indians, not for the remaining land—but guarded so that the lumbermen shall not be put to any greater expense than to get out just what is valuable and leave all the dangerous part of it there.

The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I presume, is not familiar with the question of lumbering, but somebody ought to have told the gentlemen who were getting up this bill that it contained safeguards for those who buy the land and only for them, leaving all the danger and the liability to fire and injury carefully protected by this proposed law, so that the lumbermen shall not be compelled to remove them at all.

There is another thing to which I wish to call the attention of the friends of this bill, and what is the serious objection to it. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs is authorized to sell this land by eighty-acre parcels, wherever inside of the limits the bids are and wherever he is able to sell it. As long as a great tract of pine lands is left uncut and undisturbed all through its center, there is no great danger of fire; as every lumberman knows, fire does not spread there; but wherever the best of these pine lands are scattered around here and there and all through the reservation, the bill provides that they may be sold. The cutting goes on, the tops are left; by mere force of the bill everything that is inflammable is to be left there. The lumbermen cannot remove it if they would. They shall not burn the tops; they shall not burn the hollow butts.

It is a bill as carefully provided to introduce fires all through that region by letting tracts be picked out here and there, and all over this pine reservation, as any bill could possibly be drawn; and if it were done to protect the Indians, as the chairman of the committee says, I do not know of a bill that could be drawn to injure their property in future, and prepare for its injury more carefully, than this bill has been drawn.

The objection to selling it here and there in eighty-acre lots around through this great lumber tract is a great objection. I say to the Senators on this floor that there is no lumberman of the Northwest who could be called before a committee but what would testify that in his own tract, if he owned such a tract of land, he never would sell eighty acres in the middle of his tract, or in the interior, or scattered around, without selling the whole.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. In what part of the bill does the Senator find the provision that eighty acres in the center of the tract shall be sold?

Mr. CONGER. I understand the bill provides that after being appraised it may be offered for sale and that it shall be sold in eighty-acre lots, and that if it is not all sold that year it may be reappraised the next year. The bill contemplates that it is to be sold in parcels through the land.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Not necessarily through the land; that is in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. He can direct that the sale shall commence at one side of the reservation or at one end of it, and go clear through as far as they go, if he desires to do so. It is left entirely to his discretion.

Mr. CONGER. The bill does not say so.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The bill leaves it to his discretion.

Mr. CONGER. The bill allows each purchaser to pick out the land.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It does not do any such thing.

Mr. CONGER. It does not compel anybody to buy what he does not choose, but——

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Of course you cannot compel anybody to buy what he does not choose to buy.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator understands lumbering some. Does he not know that selecting eighty acres here and there through that tract, and lumbering it, makes the best preparation possible for fire through the whole?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. But there is nothing that authorizes anybody to select eighty acres here and there. If men buy any portion of the reservation they must buy such portion as the Secretary of the Interior directs shall be sold.

Mr. CONGER. And the bill directs him to sell it all.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. No; the bill does not direct him to sell it all. The bill leaves it entirely to his discretion whether he sells any of it or not.

Mr. CONGER. There is no limitation that it shall all be sold clean as you go, from one side or one end.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That is left entirely to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CONGER. That is leaving it to the wrong place——

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think not.

Mr. CONGER. Because if the Secretary of the Interior has made a provision in the bill, and it is said he suggested it, that the tops and the waste shall by the law be left there——

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I would not discuss that any more.

Mr. CONGER. It is pretty ridiculous, I must say.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senator has talked about it until we understand it perfectly.

Mr. CONGER. That is a provision which looks so ridiculous that I called it up with a great deal of reluctance.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senator appears to have dwelt on it with a great deal of pleasure. If the Senator thinks the bill is not sufficiently guarded, perhaps it had better go over to-day in order to allow him to suggest such amendments as he may desire.

Mr. CONGER. I make these suggestions for the benefit of those in charge of the bill. I will venture to say that there is no Senator in whose State lumbering operations are carried on but knows that the objections I make are strong ones against the particular form of selling this land proposed. No man will say but what in the preservation of the little remaining pine in the United States, if there can be a tract of 200,000,000 acres of pine, as I understand this is, on an Indian reservation that can be preserved from destruction for the future, it is very desirable that it should not be sold now.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It may be desirable for others, but not desirable for the Indians who own it.

Mr. CONGER. The pine timber is being cut up and destroyed from the three great Northwestern pine States with a wonderful rapidity, and such a tract of land of two hundred million acres ten years hence will be worth double what it is to-day, if it can be preserved from fire and be preserved intact.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I wish the Senator would impress that upon the pine-land owners of Michigan.

Mr. SAWYER. The clause the Senator speaks of about not taking timber over a foot in diameter was recommended by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I agree with the Senator, but the committee did not feel at liberty, and I did not, to strike it out, because it was recommended by the Commissioner. I do not think it does any harm or any good. I do not think anybody cares about the provision, but as long as the Commissioner of Indian Affairs recommended to have it put in the friends of the bill did not feel at liberty to leave it out. That is the amount of it.

So far as the point is raised about having the land sold in separate tracts, the object was to get competition, to get bidders, so that every man who had money enough to buy eighty acres could compete with any man who had a million dollars, and who could buy the whole tract. To allow it to be sold in one entire tract would lead to a combination, and the timber might not bring what it is worth.

Mr. DAWES. I do not feel justified in taking up the time, as has been done so unexpectedly, of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] If the Senate think that this all ought to be put up in one tract, so that one large timber dealer alone could bid it in, let them say so.

Mr. CONGER. There has been no suggestion of that kind by me, but it was that beginning at one side of this tract it should be sold clean as it went, so that the remainder of it should not have these lumber portions through the midst of it.

Mr. DAWES. There is no provision in the bill to put any common sense into the Indian Office. That may be a defect in the bill, but that did not occur to us at the time. I think that ought to be in a separate bill.

Mr. CONGER. Such legislation would have directed itself most favorably not to the Indian Office but to the committee.

Mr. DAWES. That may be. That is what is the trouble with the Senator from Michigan. The Senator should have been put at the head of this committee, and I will take particular pains myself that he shall be hereafter; but these lumbermen from Wisconsin and the rest of the committee seemed to have some little sense, and as we could not put any more particular wisdom into the Indian Office in this bill, we thought we would run the risk. The Senator from Michigan thinks it is too great a risk, and perhaps we had better let the bill go over, but I should like to have it pass if there is no objection.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator from Massachusetts can have his bill passed, I do not object.

Mr. CONGER. I hope by personal reflections upon myself the Senator will not distract the attention of the Senate from the consideration of this bill and the rights of the Indians and the interest of the country. It is immaterial whether I am a younger Senator or not, if the objections are good they are good, let them come even from as humble a member of the Senate as I am.

Mr. DAWES. Nobody but the Senator from Michigan can reflect himself, that is certain; and nobody will attempt to do it. Any objection which the Senator submits to this bill, to meet the approval of the Senate, I suppose he will offer as an amendment. The Senator contents himself, however, with making objections to the bill, dropping it there. The objections to the bill are those which go to the discretion of the Indian Office. If the Senate has not any confidence in that office the bill had better not pass at all. It must be administered by the Indian Office. If the Senate thinks that it can sell timber up in Michigan—no, up in Wisconsin; I know it cannot in Michigan, as well as the Senator from Michigan—but if the Senate thinks the seventy-six members here can dispose of timber up in Wisconsin better than the Indian Office, I think the bill had better not pass.

Mr. CONGER. My own opinion is that the Government had better not engage in the lumbering business at any rate. I might say that as a whole, as to the Senate, the Indian Commissioner, or anybody else, let them sell land when they want to sell it, and use the avails for the benefit of the Indians.

Mr. DAWES. The fires having burned off the timber in Michigan, one would suppose the Senator from Michigan would have learned something from experience.

Mr. CONGER. And the Senator from Michigan knows that the great fires in Michigan and in Wisconsin were caused by leaving the waste of the trees scattered all through the forest and inviting those immense fires which have destroyed life and property to such an alarming extent. The bill provides that those means shall remain on the ground for the purpose of adding fuel to the flame.

Mr. DAWES. Then move to strike it out.

Mr. HALE. I have been waiting to see which of the Senators would get the last word. Now, unless the bill is going to be passed, I object to it; and let it go over.

Mr. DAWES. Let us have a vote.

Mr. HALE. I do not object to a vote.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONGER. Was there a vote called for?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONGER. It was so mild that it passed without notice. I should like to have a vote on that bill, just to give one vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question again on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH EUROPE.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask for the consideration of Senate bill No. 2084. It will take no time.

Mr. HALE. I do not want the Senator from Maryland to run across the Senator from Michigan. I will yield if it involves no debate.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 2084) to encourage and promote telegraphic communication between America and Europe.

Mr. ALLISON. What committee reported the bill?

Mr. GORMAN. The Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ALLISON. It is a pretty important bill.

Mr. GORMAN. It is in conformity with similar acts passed heretofore.

Mr. ALLISON. It gives this company authority to lay cables anywhere on the Atlantic shore. It involves the whole question of charter privileges to corporations for telegraphic purposes. I do not know that I have any objection to the bill. I only want to call attention to its importance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. The first amendment is, in line 9, after the word "cables," to insert:

Provided, That said company shall begin to lay said cable or cables within one year from the passage of this act: And provided further.

Mr. GORMAN. I move to strike out "one year" and insert "two years." The committee's amendment limits the laying of the cable to one year from the passage of the act. I move to amend the amendment, to make it "two years."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add as section 3 the following:

SEC. 3. That nothing in this act shall be construed to limit the United States in granting to other persons or companies similar privileges herein contained.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Is there a clause authorizing the alteration, amendment, or repeal of the act?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. The committee propose to add as section 4 the following:

SEC. 4. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act at any time is hereby reserved to Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6244) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

On motion of Mr. ALLISON, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives to the said bill, and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. DAWES, and Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia.

ALLOWANCE OF CLAIMS—ERROR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the joint resolution (H. R. No. 249) amending a paragraph in the act for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department, approved May 1, 1882, and to correct an error in the enrollment thereof.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I ask that that resolution be considered at this time. It corrects an error made by the enrolling clerks.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was read three times, and passed.

GEORGE G. COBB.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. No. 5536) to reissue a Treasury draft originally issued to George G. Cobb, an assistant assessor in Alabama, deceased, to J. E. Cobb, custodian of the minor children of said decedent; and it was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Senate to consider that bill. A moment's explanation, I think, will satisfy the Senate that the bill ought to be passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Acting Secretary read the bill.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 3854) to repeal so much of section 3385 of the Revised Statutes as imposes an export tax on tobacco was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PATENTS FOR MINING LANDS.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I ask leave to call up Senate bill No. 1830. It is a short bill, the passage of which is desired very much by the Committee on Mines and Mining.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1830) to amend section 2325 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the subject treated of by that section of the Revised Statutes?

Mr. MILLER, of California. There are certain amendments to the bill reported.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the section of the Revised Statutes be read.

Mr. INGALLS. I will observe, before the section is read, that a more vicious method of altering the law than that provided by this bill cannot be devised. It leaves the subject wholly in the dark, and I would suggest to the Senator from California that he change the bill by having the section included as it will read when amended.

Mr. MILLER, of California. This is an addition to the section, and I do not think it leaves anything in the dark.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be read.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The section of the Revised Statutes can be read from the Clerk's desk.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 2325. A patent for any land claimed and located for valuable deposits may be obtained in the following manner: any person, association, or corporation authorized to locate a claim under this chapter, having claimed and located a piece of land for such purposes, who has, or have, complied with the terms of this chapter, may file in the proper land office an application for a patent, under oath, showing such compliance, together with a plat and field-notes of the claim or claims in common, made by or under the direction of the United States surveyor-general, showing accurately the boundaries of the claim or claims, which shall be distinctly marked by monuments on the ground, and shall post a copy of such plat, together with a notice of such application for a patent, in a conspicuous place on the land embraced in such plat previous to the filing of the application for a patent, and shall file an affidavit of at least two persons that such notice has been duly posted, and shall file a copy of the notice in such land office, and shall thereupon be entitled to a patent for the land, in the manner following: the register of the land office, upon the filing of such application, plat, field-notes, notices, and affidavits, shall publish a notice that such application has been made, for the period of sixty days, in a newspaper to be by him designated as published nearest to such claim; and he shall also post such notice in his office for the same period. The claimant at the time of filing this application, or at any time thereafter, within the sixty days of publication, shall file with the register a certificate of the United States surveyor-general that $500 worth of labor has been expended or improvements made upon the claim by himself or grantors; that the plat is correct, with such further description by such reference to natural objects or permanent monuments as shall identify the claim, and furnish an accurate description, to be incorporated in the patent. At the expiration of the sixty days of publication the claimant shall file his affidavit, showing that the plat and notice have been posted in a conspicuous place on the claim during such period of publication. If no adverse claim shall have been filed with the register and the receiver of the proper land office at the expiration of the sixty days of publication, it shall be assumed that the applicant is entitled to a patent, upon the payment to the proper officer of $5 per acre, and that no adverse claim exists; and thereafter no objection from third parties to the issuance of a patent shall be heard, except it be shown that the applicant has failed to comply with the terms of this chapter.

Mr. INGALLS. Now read the amendment.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

That section 2325 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following——

Mr. MILLER, of California. Read it as amended by the committee.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That when a protest or objection shall be made to any proceeding under this chapter in the General Land Office, the party or parties protesting or objecting, in case they fail to sustain said protest or objection, shall be liable to the applicant for patent or his grantees for all costs and expenses which shall be incurred by or result from the filing of such protest or objection.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The amendment is designed to correct an abuse which has grown up of parties filing pretended protests against the granting of patents, thus tying up the title to valuable mining property. This bill merely provides that when a protest is made and the party fails to make it good he shall pay the costs and expenses of the proceeding. It is designed to stop this practice of blackmail, which is now resorted to in the West to a great extent as all the Senators from that part of the country very well know.

Mr. CHILCOTT. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kansas will listen to me a moment I will make an explanation of this bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I shall be happy to hear it.

Mr. CHILCOTT. Mr. President, I desire to occupy the time of the Senate but a few minutes on this amendment to the mining laws, and shall only do so by way of explanation, as the object of the amendment may not be generally understood.

The amendment proposed to section 2325 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is intended, and will undoubtedly operate, as a check against the common practice resorted to by unscrupulous and irresponsible parties of filing objections, or protests, to the issuance of patents to mining claims, in cases where no cause of complaint exists, and where the protestant (after having due notice under the law) failed to file an adverse claim.

The notice required to be given under the law by the applicant for a patent is ample for the protection of the rights of all parties.

The law provides that a notice shall be posted on the claim in the local land office where the case is pending and in a newspaper of general circulation nearest the location of the mine for which the patent is sought continuous for sixty days. Hence it will be observed that adverse claims may be filed at any time during said sixty days' notice, thereby staying all proceedings until the controversy is settled, or decided by a court of competent jurisdiction, or the adverse claim waived.

But there is a marked difference between an adverse claimant before the local land office and one who files an objection or protest against the issuance of a patent before the General Land Office. The former files his adverse claim in good faith, asserting his title to a part or the whole of the tract for which an application is pending, and where every opportunity is given the contestant to substantiate his rights to the property; whereas the latter, who has utterly ignored his rights before the local land office, and who has no pecuniary interest whatever in the property, may file a protest in the General Land Office by getting up fraudulent affidavits alleging irregularity or non-compliance with the law in the proceedings before the local land office by the applicant for patent, and thereby prevent the issuance of a patent for months or for years, to the great detriment of the rightful owners, and without the shadow of title thereto.

These protests in cases before the General Land Office are generally made for the purpose of forcing a compromise or consideration from the rightful owners for the withdrawal of the protest.

All these things operate disastrously against the applicant for patent, especially in cases where a sale is pending, or where funds are required for the development of the mine.

The object of this bill is not to jeopardize the rights of any person, but to fix a penalty against the protestant who fails to sustain his allegations with proper proof, which will, in my opinion, materially lessen, if not entirely overcome, the common practice of filing fraudulent protests in the General Land Office.

My further purpose in presenting this amendment at this time is to protect the rights of every one engaged in the actual development of the mineral resources of the country. Men who risk their all in the development of the mines should be protected from mine-jumping sharks and blackmailers.

In every case where an application for a patent has been filed for a valuable mine before the General Land Office a protest has followed, and in every instance by parties who had every facility for offering adverse proof at the proper time if they had so desired. This doctrine of filing protests not only works a hardship to parties who are wealthy, and who have liberally spent their money in developing the mines, but it works a greater hardship to the poor man who, by economy and hard labor, has performed the required amount of labor to entitle him to a patent for his claim, and who has given the usual notice under the law inviting adverse claimants to appear and show cause why a patent should not issue if they desired to do so; but all such cases (if the mine is of great value) are also met at the General Land Office by a protest or objection to the issuing of a patent therefor, and in many cases, not having the necessary means to follow the case to the General Land Office, is compelled to accept a small compensation or lose his claim. This bill has the indorsement of the Secretary of the Interior, as well as all mining men; and although I consider the bill as presented to the committee the proper bill to pass, I am willing to accept it as amended for the present, believing it will be better than the present law.

Mr. GARLAND. In connection with the statute sought to be amended by this bill, which relates to a very important subject, I beg to suggest that I think the general rule of amending so as to incorporate the statute intended to be amended should be followed in a matter of this importance. I propose to amend in lines 4 and 5 by striking out "by adding thereto the following" and inserting "so as to read as follows;" and then it will read:

That section 2325 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

Then incorporate the entire section down to the proviso, and then follow on with the proviso as proposed in this bill.

I think the amendment offered by the Senator from California is right and proper and will prevent captious objections to the issuing of patents, and will only allow a contest where there is really a just claim or a supposed just claim. I propose to re-enact the section and add to it this amendment. I think that is the only proper way of doing the thing, and then the title of the bill will have to be amended by adding after "United States" the words "touching the issuance of patents to mineral lands."

Mr. MILLER, of California. I see no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendments of the Committee on Mines and Mining. They have not yet been acted on.

The ACTING SECRETARY. After the word "be," in line 6, the committee propose to strike out "filed" and insert "made to any proceeding;" in line 7, after the word "chapter," to insert "in the General Land Office;" in line 9, after the word "sustain," to strike out "their claim by proof" and insert "said protest or objection;" in line 11, after the word "all," to insert "costs and;" and in the same line, after the word "expenses," to strike out "and damages;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That when a protest or objection shall be made to any proceeding under this chapter in the General Land Office, the party or parties protesting or objecting, in case they fail to sustain said protest or objection, shall be liable to the applicant for patent or his grantees for all costs and expenses which shall be incurred by or result from the filing of such protest or objection.

The amendments were agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Now the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] to strike out in line 4 "by adding thereto the following" and inserting "so as to read as follows," and inserting the section in the Revised Statutes to come in before the word "provided" in the amendment reported.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 2325 of the Revised Statutes of the United States touching the issuance of patents for mineral lands."

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO WEDNESDAY.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Wednesday.

Mr. HOAR. We had better not do that now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Perhaps the motion had better be deferred until after the deficiency bill is through.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. No; I should like a vote on the motion now.

Mr. HOAR. I hope it will not be passed now. It is getting late, and every little thing causes the loss of a day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion until after we pass the deficiency bill, in order that we may see whether we are surely going to get through with it to-day.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I do not think any Senator will object to staying here to-day until the bill is passed.

Mr. HALE. The motion will go through easier if it is offered afterward.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I think it will go through easily enough now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator withdraw the motion for the present?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I withdraw it for the time.

ANTONIO VACA.

Mr. BAYARD. The Committee on Private Land Claims instruct me to return a message of the President containing a communication from the Secretary of the Interior in relation to the claim of Antonio Vaca, deceased. It was inadvertently sent to the Committee on Private Land Claims. I return it to the Senate and ask that it be sent to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Private Land Claims will be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and the communication sent to the Committee on Appropriations.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 1st instant approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

An act (S. No. 789) to regulate the use of the Capitol grounds;

An act (S. No. 1158) to authorize the supreme court of the District of Columbia to appoint two additional criers; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 58) to print Dr. John L. Hayes's pamphlet upon the husbandry of the Angora goat.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARRISON asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2119) for the relief of Martin L. Bundy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6244) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. J. G. CANNON of Illinois, Mr. FRANK HISCOCK of New York, and Mr. J. D. C. ATKINS of Tennessee, managers at the conference on its part.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 62) to provide for the erection of a public building for the nse of the post-office and Government officers at the city of Terre Haute, Indiana.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4179) for the erection of a public building at Oxford, Mississippi, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. Now, Mr. President, I hope we may go on with the deficiency bill.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6243) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes.

The reading of the bill was resumed at page 35, line 830, of the first section. The Committee on Appropriations proposed to amend the bill by inserting under the head "Department of Justice," after line 831:

For contingent expenses of the Department, $2,750.

To pay the balance due for rent of four floors of the Freedman's Bank building to and including May 31, the date of the transfer of the property to the United States, $4,587.90.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 865, after the word "dollars," to strike out "for fees of witnesses, $40,000;" and in line 866, after the word "all," to strike out "four hundred and thirty-two" and insert "three hundred and eighty-six;" so as to make the clause read:

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator from Maine desire to have the committee amendments first acted upon? I should like to offer an amendment at the close of the District appropriations.

Mr. HALE. We are running through with the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. INGALLS. Very well; let the reading proceed.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Miscellaneous," after line 1197, to insert:

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, under the head of "Navy Department, claims allowed by the Fourth Auditor," in line 383, to increase the item of appropriation "for pay of the Navy prior to July 1, 1879," from $19,692.20 to $20,343.78.

The next amendment was, in section 3, after line 81, to insert:

The next amendment was, in section 5, after line 4, to insert:

To pay D. F. Murphy, Official Reporter of the Senate, for extra services and for clerk hire paid out by him, $1,000, for the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress.

Mr. HALE. I move in section 5, line 5, before the word "to," to insert "and," to precede the committee's amendment, and to strike out the period at the end of the House section. That puts the two clauses for the reporters of the two Houses on the same footing, so that the whole section as to both will be before the committee of conference striking out the period.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) That amendment will be agreed to if there be no objection. The question is on the amendment as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was to strike out section 6 of the bill, in the following words:

SEC. 6. That in all cases in this act where the year for the use of the appropriation made is stated, for instance, the year "1881," it is intended to indicate the year ending June 30, 1881, and the same with any other year stated, it in all cases indicates the fiscal year. In all cases where no year is indicated it is understood that the appropriation is for the year ending June 30, 1882, for which deficiencies this act is principally intended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section:

SEC. 6. That a board of audit, consisting of the First and Second Comptrollers of the Treasury and the Treasurer of the United States, is hereby constituted, to whom shall be referred all claims and the determination of all allowances to be made growing out of the illness and burial of the late President, James A. Garfield; that the said board shall hear, examine, and determine all questions arising out of said claims and proposed allowances, and shall make and award in each case for services rendered, or supplies furnished, which, when received, shall be taken in full compensation of all demand whatsoever; that said board of audit shall issue a certificate, signed by each member of said board, setting forth the amount awarded to each person, and on account of what services rendered, or supplies furnished, and shall transmit said certificate to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall cause to be paid to the several persons named therein, or their legal representatives, the amount so certified; and to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay said awards the sum of $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated; and of this amount not more than $52,500 in all shall be certified and paid for medical services and allowance; and in making said awards it shall be lawful for said board to make allowances to employés of the Government for extra services in amounts not exceeding three months of their current pay: Provided, That no claim shall be considered and no allowance shall be made by said board on or after January 1, 1883: And provided further, That the aggregate amount of awards made by said board shall not exceed the amount hereby appropriated.

Mr. VEST. I make the point on this section that it is not authorized by any existing law, does not come within the province of the Committee on Appropriations, and is general legislation. In addition to that, a spirit of comity would prevent us now from taking up this matter in view of the position of this claim, if it may be so termed, in the House of Representatives. On April 19, 1882, as I see by the paper I hold in my hand, a report was made in the House of Representatives—a majority report and a minority report. This matter has laid there in the House from that day to this. The minority of that committee have demanded and implored time and again that the matter should be taken up in the House of Representatives, but without avail. Not one particle of testimony has been offered, as I am informed, in regard to these claims; not one scintilla of proof has ever been made, and the extraordinary fact is presented to the American Congress and people that for surgical attendance upon a pus cavity, without ever noticing the wound which killed the President, we are now to pay $52,500 to a lot of physicians.

Mr. HALE. I suppose the Senator does not propose to go on and consider the merits of the claims of the physicians in making his point of order?

Mr. VEST. No, sir; I am not doing that; I am speaking simply of the fact that this matter is pending in the House of Representatives—I have a right to mention that—and that now it is presented here in the Senate without any proof whatever. But if the Senator wishes that the rule shall be strictly enforced I simply make the point of order.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, setting aside every question there may be as to the force of the point of order raised by the Senator from Missouri, I ask him to consider for a moment before insisting on making it the desirability of Congress putting all of these matters appertaining to the last illness and death of the late President out of the way, so that they may be known to be disposed of entirely. The committee believed that instead of introducing upon the floor of Congress a discussion as to the merits of the physicians, as to the relative size of the bills that should be allowed to each, and all of the questions that would follow about the treatment of that great case, it was much better that a tribunal of suitable dignity should be chosen by Congress, to whom all of these matters should be sent for determination. The committee in casting about finally settled upon the two Comptrollers and the Treasurer, in the Treasury Department, the greatest officers in that Department next to the Secretary. These officials, made a board for determining all these questions, can receive all the claims, all the bills, and under a limitation fixed in amount can consider every question in whatever shape or form it may arise, and certify the result to the Secretary, and have the sums found due paid.

I, for one, am not desirous that all of the subjects-matter involved in the rivalry of physicians, the question who shall be paid the most, the question whether the attendance was worth so much or not so much, shall be settled by us and by the House of Representatives. There has been no desire on the part of the Committee on Appropriations to interfere with the special committee of the House of Representatives; but as the Senator from Missouri says, the whole matter has lain there for weeks and months and the session is in its waning days——

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a point of order. Is this a debatable question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate goes on by general consent.

Mr. HOAR. I object to it.

Mr. HALE. I had said all I wished to say. We have no desire to interfere with the House committee, but we want the matter settled at this session. I hope the Senator from Missouri will not insist on his point of order.

Mr. ALLISON. I want to say one word before the Chair decides the point of order, if I can do so.

Mr. HOAR. I do not object, of course, to any suggestion as to the point of order.

Mr. HALE. I only desire to speak to that.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

Mr. ALLISON. This whole question was referred to the Committee on Appropriations by a proposition sent to it by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] in the early part of the session, and the committee of the Senate has just as much power to consider this question, having had the matter referred to it, as any committee of the House. It is certainly in order for us to propose an appropriation for this purpose; and that being in order, it is certainly in order beyond that to make a suggestion as to the method of auditing these claims, as they are not claims that can be audited in the ordinary course of the present method of auditing claims through the accounting officers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Missouri state his point of order?

Mr. VEST. The point of order I make is that this is general legislation that has not been before acted upon by Congress, and does not come properly within the scope of a deficiency bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That it is not relevant to the bill?

Mr. VEST. Not relevant to the bill, and there is no act of Congress authorizing it. It is just exactly like incorporating in this bill a private claim. It is a private claim, it is no deficiency, and there is no pretense that there is any deficiency in any Department of the Government for which it provides, but it is a claim of certain physicians, if you can call it a claim, for a gratuity from the Government of the United States for medical attendance, or what purported to be medical attendance, upon the wounded President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read Rule 29.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

29. No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill, nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill be received, nor shall any amendment to any item or clause of such bill be received which does not directly relate thereto; and all questions of relevancy of amendments under this rule, when raised, shall be submitted to the Senate and decided without debate, and any amendment to a general appropriation bill may be laid on the table without prejudice to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule requires that questions of relevancy shall be submitted to the Senate and decided without debate. The Chair submits that question to the Senate: Is the amendment relevant to the bill?

Mr. HOAR. Can there be anything irrelevant to a deficiency bill?

Mr. INGALLS. Is debate in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question of the Senator from Massachusetts is a question for the Senate to decide, not for the Chair.

Mr. HALE. Let us have a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators in the affirmative who are of the opinion that the amendment is relevant to the bill will say "ay;" the Senators in the negative will say "no." [Putting the question.] The Chair is unable to decide by the sound.

Mr. HALE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. VEST. Will the Chair permit me to make a suggestion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It can be made only by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRIS. Is not the question of order submitted to the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is submitted to the Senate by the rule.

Mr. HARRIS. Is it not debatable when submitted to the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not under Rule 29.

Mr. VEST. The first objection which I made has been passed over by the Chair, and that is that this amendment is general legislation. The first point I make in regard to the amendment being in order is "that no amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill." This is general legislation, clearly and emphatically so; and I ask the Chair to decide upon that point, because if the Chair holds that this is general legislation it is unnecessary to submit the second branch of the subject to the Senate. I say that this is "general legislation."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, having submitted the question to the Senate, will not decide any part of it, but will submit the whole question to the Senate.

Mr. WINDOM. What is the question submitted? Is it anything except relevancy?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri raises the point that it is new legislation also.

Mr. WINDOM. Is that also submitted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is also submitted.

Mr. WINDOM. The question of general legislation is debatable, is it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not desire to debate it, but it occurs to me that this is not general legislation. Here is $75,000 appropriated, and all the committee do is to direct how that sum shall be disposed of. I think it has always been held on appropriation bills that where a specific sum is appropriated and the legislation merely directs how that sum for that year, not running through a period of years, shall be disposed of, it does not come within the rule. I can see nothing else in the amendment except a mode of disposing of the $75,000 which is appropriated by it.

Mr. HALE. So far from its being general legislation, does not the whole force and operation of it cease when this particular clause has been worked out under the bill?

Mr. WINDOM. Of course.

Mr. HALE. There is nothing left on the statute-book touching the allowance, or any other subject in the amendment, as it applies to nothing but this $75,000. It dies of itself after it is exhausted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, is this amendment liable to objection under Rule 29, covering all the points?

Mr. VEST. That is, it is not germane.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator to raise all the points of order under the rule.

Mr. VEST. I understand that under Rule 29 the only question submitted to the Senate is the question of relevancy. The rule reads:

And all questions of relevancy of amendments under this rule, when raised, shall be submitted to the Senate and be decided without debate.

That is the only question the Chair can lay before the Senate. As to the question of its being general legislation, that cannot be submitted to the Senate under Rule 29.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is obliged to submit the question of relevancy to the Senate, but the Chair has a right to submit any question of order to the Senate.

Mr. VEST. I understand, though, that the Chair is proceeding under Rule 29, and under that rule he now submits to the Senate the question of relevancy alone.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair submits all the points of order raised by the Senator from Missouri, unless any Senator desires to have them divided.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then it must be a debatable question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is debatable under the modified objection of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST.]

Mr. VEST. I have stated already, as fully as I care to do, the authority for my objection that this is general legislation. There is no act of Congress which authorizes the appropriation of this money. The Senator from Minnesota says that a specific amount is appropriated, and therefore that it is not subject to the objection which I make. Mr. President, that is not the point. This appropriation is not to carry out any existing law, and that is the very essence and meaning of a deficiency bill. Where is the law which authorizes this appropriation? If the Senator from Minnesota is correct in his position, then under a deficiency bill Congress can provide for every claim that has come before Congress during the whole session. Is that the meaning of a deficiency bill? The very definition of "deficiency" is that there is an existing law and Congress has failed to provide the pecuniary means or instrumentality to carry it out and make it effective, and then under a general deficiency bill we provide for that defect.

Here is the very case provided for in Rule 29. The Committee on Appropriations bring in here not a deficiency, they bring in here a piece of legislation de novo, and I beg the Senators on the other side of this Chamber and upon my own side to put this case on no partisan ground; to look upon it as no partisan question. If the position of the Senator from Minnesota is correct, then the meaning of a deficiency bill is utterly destroyed as it has always been understood under the rules of Congress and in parliamentary proceedings. Where is the deficiency? To be a deficiency there must have been an object appropriated for and sufficient money not provided, and therefore a deficiency. Where is the law that made this appropriation? You might just as well bring in a bill for John Smith for horses, Tom Jones for wagons lost in the service of the country, never heard of before in the Halls of Congress, and tell me that is a deficiency, when no existing legislation has ever provided for it.

And, Mr. President, I want now and here distinctly to disclaim any sort of feeling in regard to this matter from a personal or partisan stand-point. If I know myself, I abhorred the assassination of the late President as deeply and sincerely as his most intimate political friends, but I have sincere convictions in regard to this appropriation. I am prepared to show that it is the most infamous piece of work, in my judgment, that was ever brought before the American people. I am prepared to show, as I believe, and I stand here now to show it if the opportunity is presented, that so far from being compelled to pay——

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

Mr. VEST. Well, what is the question?

Mr. HOAR. The Senator is not at liberty to debate the merits of the appropriation.

Mr. VEST. I understood the Senators on the other side did debate the merits of the question, but I waive that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair was not in when the debate began.

Mr. VEST. Very good. Then, Mr. President, I have no disposition to trespass upon the patience of the Senate or any rule of the Senate. I simply ask the Chair now whether in the first place the Chair will submit to the Senate the question of whether this is general legislation or not? The question of relevancy under Rule 29 is to be submitted to the Senate, but it is for the Chair to decide whether this is general legislation or not within the meaning of the other rule, and I ask the present occupant and the regular occupant of the chair to make that decision.

Mr. HAWLEY. Allow me to ask the Senator's attention to a decision under both Rule 30 and Rule 29. Rule 30 is that which says:

No amendment, the object of which is to provide for a private claim, shall be received to any general appropriation bill, unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law or a treaty stipulation, which shall be cited on the face of the amendment.

The Senate had under consideration a similar bill.

The Senate having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6471) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government, &c., on the question to agree to the reported amendment, (to refund to the city of Baltimore certain moneys,)

A question of order was raised, namely: That the object of the amendment was to provide for a private claim, and was not in order under the thirtieth rule.

It seems to me it is quite analogous to the pending question.

The Chair submitted the question to the Senate, Is the amendment in order under the thirtieth rule?

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 37, nays 15.

A second question of order was then raised, namely: That the amendment proposed general legislation to a general appropriation bill, and was not in order under the first clause of the twenty-ninth rule.

The Chair submitted the question to the Senate, and it was decided that the amendment was in order.—Senate Journal, third session Forty-fifth Congress, page 416.

In this case, though there may be conflicting precedents, I propose, and especially that I may avoid the kind of discussion intimated by the Senator from Missouri, to give the benefit of the doubt in favor of the amendment reported by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has no doubt about the point raised. This is "general legislation," clearly and unmistakably.

Mr. HOAR. I understood that the predecessor in the chair of our President had already submitted that matter to the Senate, and it is now pending before the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. The yeas and nays have been ordered on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He submitted the question of relevancy to the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Both questions had been submitted distinctly as one point by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] when in the chair, and the yeas and nays were called on it and ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Very well, then, the Chair will not make any decision.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to call the attention of the Senate and of the Chair to the fact that a mere provision for a private claim which begins and ends so that no law is in force after this is exhausted has never been held to be "general legislation" in the Senate; and the precedent cited by the Senator from Connecticut is to that effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair himself has no doubt on that point; but if it was submitted, the sense of the Senate will be taken.

Mr. HAWLEY. That identical point was decided 37 to 15 in the Senate in the Forty-fifth Congress.

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir; the Senate generally decides what it wants on questions of order. This rule is clear and explicit. If the present occupant, the regular Presiding Officer of the Senate, sees proper to submit it, well and good.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair submits it because it has been submitted already.

Mr. VEST. I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair himself would have no hesitancy in deciding it. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. COCKRELL. What are we to vote on?

Mr. HALE. The question submitted was, as I believe, Is the amendment in order under Rule 29? That is all we are voting upon, as I understand.

Mr. COCKRELL. Under that rule we cannot vote on the question of whether this is legislation or not.

Mr. ALLISON. The point to be voted on is whether the amendment is in order under rule of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Under any rule, whether the amendment is in order.

Mr. HARRIS. The question is, is the amendment in order under the rules of the Senate?

Mr. HOAR. That is it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the question. Is the amendment in order under the rules of the Senate? That broadens it so as to apply to any rule.

Mr. BECK. Let me ask, do not those who believe it is general legislation, and, therefore, not in order, vote "nay?"

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes; and those who believe that it is not relevant to a deficiency bill vote "nay." Those who think it is in order will vote "yea."

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when Mr. CALL'S name was called.) I was requested by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] to state that he is unavoidably absent from the Senate and he is paired, but I do not now remember with whom.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when his name was called.) The Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE,] who is absent by order of the Senate, requested me to pair with him. I am paired with him on this and other questions.

Mr. PENDLETON, (when the name of Mr. JONAS was called.) The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] requested me to announce that he is paired to-day with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. McMILLAN.]

Mr. MILLER, of California, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. FARLEY.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. JOHNSTON, (after having voted in the negative.) I withdraw my vote as I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MITCHELL,]

Mr. McMILLAN. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. JONAS.]

Mr. ALLISON, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] on general questions. I am advised by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] that I ought to be regarded as paired on this question, and I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] is unavoidably absent, and I understand the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] is also absent; I have therefore paired Mr. CALL with Mr. MILLER. As already announced, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] is unavoidably absent, and is paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

Mr. BECK. My colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] is necessarily absent to-day. He is paired on all questions with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.] My colleague would vote "nay" if he were here.

Mr. CONGER. My colleague [Mr. FERRY] is paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.]

Mr. HILL, of Colorado, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. FAIR.] I forgot it, and now withdraw my vote.

Mr. GARLAND, (after having voted in the negative.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] and I ask leave to withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote will be withdrawn.

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—20.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate decides that the amendment is in order. The question is on the adoption of the amendment reported as section 6. Those in favor of it——

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I do not propose that this provision shall go through without debate, in this sort of fashion, if I can help it. As I was about proceeding to say when Senators on the other side raised the question of order in regard to general debate, I can with perfect propriety refer to the legislative record of the other branch of Congress as to matters in the past regarding legislation. I find that on the 19th of April, 1882, a majority report of the select committee to audit the expenses of the late President James A. Garfield's illness and burial was submitted to the House. Here was a special tribunal organized by the House of Representatives for the purpose of disposing of this question. The minority report of the committee was filed at the same time. These papers have remained upon the Speaker's desk of the House of Representatives from that day until this, when for the first time any debate is permitted on this question in the Senate.

Mr. President, in view of the extraordinary circumstances attending the death of the late President of the United States, I know how liable to misconstruction and to hostile criticism is anything that may come from a Democrat on that subject. I am prepared, however, to leave to history, to the cool and unbiased judgment of the American people, whether the Democratic party, directly or indirectly, contingently or in the most remote possibility of imagination, can be held, except in sheer malice and absurd hatred, to be at all responsible for that terrible event. Therefore, as a representative of a State, I shall discuss this question in my representative capacity freely, earnestly, and openly. I intend to do no injustic to the gentlemen whose claims are presented now for the first time for discussion before the Congress of the United States. I have no personal acquaintance with any of them. I know neither their political, their social, their religious, nor their personal affinities; but here, as a Senator of the United States, disposing of the people's money, at the close of a session, it is my duty to speak frankly, and I shall do so.

Mr. President, if anything is established by human testimony, if anything is creditable in regard to this case, it is that the late lamented President of the United States was—I will not use the word "butchered"—but unquestionably malpractice was had upon him in his last illness preceding his death. It is admitted by the medical authorities who had charge of the case, and the autopsy put it beyond any sort of question, that he was treated for a pus cavity, while the wound which hurried him to the grave never for a moment came under the attention of those eminent surgeons. I allude to this in no spirit of malevolence; but I allude to it as a matter of legitimate discussion to show that these gentlemen from a medical and scientific point of view are not entitled to the enormous fees which they now bring as a claim against the Government of the United States.

I do not put this question upon grounds of legal technicality or obligation. I represent the people of my great State when I say that they want no higgling; they want no penny policy in regard to the payment of these expenses; but I want as an honest man to put this claim as I would put any other claim, upon the basis and principle of ordinary justice between man and man or between the citizen and the Government. If this claim was presented in a probate court against the estate of James A. Garfield, (which is the tribunal where it ought to be adjudicated,) what Senator on this floor would stand up and say this is not an exorbitant, enormous, and oppressive charge? And, Mr. President, when we consider the fact that the principal recipient of this bounty, (whom I do not know, as I have said before,) for it is nothing else than a bounty from the Government, was a volunteer in the case, that he came here under no contract, that he got into this case, if human testimony is to be believed, against the will of the President and the will of his family, then, by all rules and principles of justice and right, scrutiny should be made of a claim so enormous and so disproportioned to the services rendered. On the table of the House of Representatives now are two letters from the highest surgical authority in the United States, not excepting the eminent gentleman who attended upon the death-bed of the President, Dr. Gross and Dr. Sayre. In these letters they announce the true principle which should govern the adjudication and settlement of this question. They say that if this great life had been preserved to the Government, if God had blessed great skill on the part of the surgeons and had given to the people of the United States their chosen Chief Executive, then an exceptional case would have been instituted under the laws of medical practice, and millions of dollars would not have attested too much the gratitude of a great people for the preservation of a great life.

But when that life was lost in defiance of ordinary skill—I say so deliberately—when for eighty days this heroic sufferer was physicked, and leeched, and probed, and lanced, while the bullet's flight was not known to these physicians, it is not right, justice, or reason to come here and ask for fifty-odd thousand dollars for such practice as that. Sir, if a countryman had been knocked down in a country neighborhood and treated by a country doctor in this way, a jury of the country might have been called upon to attest whether it was manslaughter or not.

Mr. President, I made the statement that the principal physician in this case was a volunteer. Will the Secretary be kind enough to read what is not contradicted, and what comes from the most intimate personal and medical friend General Garfield had upon earth, and from the devoted and loving wife upon whose bosom his dying head was pillowed; and if that authority is not sufficient to enforce the statement I do not know what can do it.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

[New York Tribune of April 26.]

MENTOR, OHIO, October 14, 1882.

This certifies that on or about August 8, 1881, the late President, James A. Garfield, made the following statement to me in presence of Mrs. Garfield, namely: That Dr. J. H. Baxter had been his physician for many years, and that he still considered him as his physician. He also stated that he had no knowledge of ever having placed himself under the professional care of Dr. D. W. Bliss, and he did not believe Dr. Bliss had ever spoken one word to him upon the subject.

Mrs. Garfield stated at the same time that she had never been consulted by Dr. Bliss upon the subject, and had no knowledge of the President having chosen Dr. Bliss as his attending surgeon.

S. A. BOYNTON, M. D.

Indorsed as follows by Mrs. Garfield:

MENTOR, OHIO, October 24, 1881.

I have read the statement of Dr. Boynton made to-day, and will say that it is entirely correct.

LUCRETIA R. GARFIELD.

DR. BLISS'S OWN STATEMENT.

[Testimony in the Guiteau trial, November, 19, 1881. Dr. Bliss under cross-examination by Mr. Scoville.]

Question. Who called you to attend this case?
Answer. The Secretary of War sent for me.
Q. When?
A. At the time of the shooting; within a few minutes after it his carriage came for me.
Q. Did you find any physician there when you arrived?
A. Yes, sir; I did. There were two physicians.
Q. Who were they?
A. Dr. Townshend and Dr. Purvis.
Q. After the President was removed to the White House who then requested you to stay or to take charge of the case, if any?
A. Do you mean the day of the shooting?
Q. Yes.
A. There was nothing said about it that day.
Q. When was there anything said about it?
A. The next morning.
Q. Who then made such a request?
A. The President.
Q. Any one else?
A. No one else. Mrs. Garfield and the President and myself were together.
Q. That was all?
A. That was all.

Mr. VEST. I leave that testimony to be determined by the credibility of the gentleman who makes this claim, by the wife of General Garfield, and by the statement of his most intimate medical and personal friend, and I think I am authorized by these facts, in stating that Dr. Bliss, the principal recipient of this bounty, was a volunteer in the case, and that he is entitled simply to payment on a quantum meruit, and upon that basis and that alone.

Mr. President, there is a remarkable similarity between the amounts appropriated in the majority report of the House committee and in the amendmet now pending before the Senate. In the report of the majority of the committee of the House of Representatives, which has lain upon the table there since April the 19th, Dr. D. W. Bliss receives $25,000, Drs. Hamilton and Agnew $15,000 each, Drs. Reyburn and Boynton and Mrs. Dr. Edson $10,000 each, making a total for professional services of $85,000. In the amendment offered by the Committee on Appropriations is the provision that "to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay said awards the sum of $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated; and of this amount not more than $52,500 in all shall be certified and paid for medical services and allowance."

Mr. COCKRELL. If my colleague will permit me, the difference between the amendment of the committee and the House provision is the difference between $52,500 and $85,000.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will allow me, the difference upon this simple matter of allowance to physicians in attendance, including all of them, is $33,000.

Mr. VEST. I understand, and I violate no logical propriety when I state that every dollar of this $52,500 will be found to be due. In my brief legislative experience in State and national affairs I have never known a provision of this sort in which the auditing board did not come up to the amount fixed by the legislative jurisdiction. I have never known them to pay back into the Treasury, or rather to fail to give to the recipients of the bounty of the legislative tribunal, one cent less than that tribunal authorized to be paid. While this provision is not mandatory, it is a legislative suggestion.

Mr. HALE. The Senator knows that there are other claims incident to this affair not covered by medical or surgical attendance, and that those other claims would swamp all the balance that there is of the appropriation over and above the $52,500.

Mr. VEST. I suppose, so; it will all be "swamped," to use the expression of the Senator. It is a swamping process in every view of it. Let me read the provision again:

And to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay said awards the sum of $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated; and of this amount not more than $52,500 in all shall be certified and paid for medical services and allowance.

What the award will be is one thing; what the deficiency will be at the next session of Congress is another. If these gentlemen see proper to make an award of $150,000 or $200,000, as a matter of course at the next session of Congress we shall hear that the Congress of the United States would be deficient in every element of patriotism, in every instinct of personal propriety and national decency, if they did not appropriate the last dollar which was found by this tribunal to be due to these gentlemen.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator from Missouri really believe that, under this limitation, as clearly and definitely fixed as human language can make it, any awards would be made by the tribunal created by this amendment for medical and surgical services and attendance to a sum exceeding the $52,500? Does the Senator believe that there is any danger of any such award?

Mr. VEST. I should not be surprised at any such award. I notice that the last portion of the section reads:

And provided further, That the aggregate amount of awards made by said board shall not exceed the amount hereby appropriated.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator has any doubt, I ask him by the invocation of all the devices in the use of human language, of which he is expert, to submit some language for this amendment that shall be so qualified in its limitation that it cannot be got around. I cannot do anything more than what is put in the bill. I ask his assistance to make it clear.

Mr. VEST. As I regard the sum of $52,500 most enormous, outrageous, and excessive, I shall certainly be a party to providing no limitation by which that amount even could constructively be allowed to these gentlemen.

There is, to make this matter short, but one criterion of common justice and of plain equity by which the whole matter should be settled. It can do Garfield and his glorious memory no good, especially in view of the testimony which the Chief Clerk has read, to pay these claims out of the Treasury of the people who loved him so well. It can illustrate no virtue of his, public or private. It is a plain question of dollars and cents now upon the record made by these physicians in their claim against the American people. No glamour, no necromantic touch of rhetoric can disguise or hide the facts in this whole case as they have passed into history.

Mr. President, I say there is but one criterion by which justice can be done in this claim. The laws of the land provide tribunals in which to adjust all claims for medical attendance against the estate of a dead man. If this claim were presented in a probate court what Senator upon this floor would dare to say that it would not be thrown out of court as outrageous and oppressive? For eighty days' attendance Dr. Bliss, this volunteer physician, according to the testimony, (I make no statement outside of the testimony of Garfield's own family,) is allowed $15,000. If he were allowed $100 a day it would be an enormous charge, a charge which would be equivalent to the services of the most eminent surgeon in the whole country, according to Dr. Gross and Dr. Sayre. For the eighty days he would receive $8,000—I say nothing of the other fees, because Dr. Bliss stands out in bold relief as the principal party and the principal claimant in this transaction—$8,000 for eighty days' attendance, when the wound that took the life of the dying President was never for one instant attended to by these physicians.

There is another aspect of this case of which I choose to say but little. In the papers of the time and of the city of New York, (and the original papers can be had if there is any question in regard to the statement,) painful as it is, outrageous almost beyond belief in the enormity of the statement, which was publicly made—and the fac similes are published, and the originals are in existence in this Capitol—the life's blood of Garfield was peddled out upon the bricks of Wall street in order to make money in stocks; and while the public bulletins declared one thing the cipher dispatches to brokers in the city of New York, signed by the son of Dr. Bliss, contradicted those bulletins, and the stocks ebbed and flowed with the life's blood of the President of this great nation.

Sir, is it possible that the American people, with such a charge as that publicly made, openly stated, with the originals, as I have said, in existence in this Capitol, will pay this enormous fee of fifty-odd thousand dollars, of which $15,000 is to go to one individual? I know not what the explanation is. I care not what it is. I know simply that the charge has been made, and that it ought to be investigated in order to preserve the honor, the dignity, the sacred instinct of the American people forever to be associated with this horrible death and the sufferings of this heroic martyr.

I leave it to those who press this claim to say how far that investigation shall be had. I simply say now that if this claim were put before any probate tribunal in this broad land, $100 a day, with the highest degree of skill, with the most eminent science, with the most assiduous nursing, with the most careful scrutiny on the part of the physician, would be considered not only a liberal but almost an exorbitant fee. Is it said that this gentleman gave up his professional practice, and therefore he must be compensated not only for his loss of time and for his labor, but for the loss of practice? To-day he stands upon a pedestal, so far as making money out of his profession is concerned, which never could have been obtained by him except for the peculiar position which he held as the confidential and almost sole medical attendant of the President during those long and trying hours.

Mr. PLUMB. Does the Senator from Missouri think that that ought to be taken into account in settling the compensation?

Mr. VEST. I think it ought to be taken into account if it is also taken into account that he lost any of his practice by reason of becoming the attendant of the dying President. Let one go with the other.

Mr. PLUMB. It seems to me that the Senator is jumping the stile before he comes to it. Is anybody saying here that the person he has named is to have any particular compensation? Is not all that question remitted to the board to be constituted for that purpose, and is the Senator warranted in saying that that board will not take into account all things proper to be taken into account regarding this person as well as the other persons connected with the illness of the President?

Mr. VEST. My friend from Kansas, for whom I have very great respect, knows full well that $52,500 will be given by this tribunal to these physicians, and that the larger portion of it in the medical department will be given to Dr. Bliss. It is useless to spend words about that; it is a self-evident proposition; there is no question in regard to it. Dr. Bliss has figured in the public prints, both at his own instance and in the comments made by the public, as the principal physician in the whole case from beginning to end. By the report in the House, which is, permit me to say respectfully, the substratum of the amendment now offered in the Senate, he would receive the lion's share of this bounty, the enormous sum of $25,000.

It is mere quibbling, I say respectfully to the Senator from Kansas, to assert that I have jumped the stile before I have come to it. All this matter has been discussed; all of it has been criticised and commented on by the public, and the argument to which I alluded, desiring not to trouble the Senate more, has been made again and again, that Dr. Bliss deserves this enormous gratuity because of the sacrifice of his private practice in obedience to the commands of duty at the bedside of the President.

Mr. PLUMB. Why does the Senator from Missouri call it a gratuity?

Mr. VEST. Because there is no contract. It is simply a gratuity on the part of the American people, and the proper way in which to bestow it would be to let these gentlemen prove their claim. Let them prove it before a probate court and against the estate of James A. Garfield, and whatever that probate tribunal allows, I pledge myself, first and forever, now here, to vote that amount in order that that estate shall be held free and harmless from it.

Mr. PLUMB. Would the Senator rather vote the sum awarded by a probate court in the State of Ohio than that awarded by officers of the United States Government after passing upon the claims?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir; a hundred times over. No tribunal in the District of Columbia for me on claims of this sort.

Mr. PLUMB. That rather seems to argue against the officers of the Government.

Mr. VEST. I do not choose to go into any personal discussion, but you can discern in the air what this award would be. The Senator knows, and I know, what the surroundings are and the influences in this District and around this Capitol as to claims against the Government, especially a claim like this. I do not choose to go into that, although I shall do so if necessary to substantiate the proposition that every dollar in this bill of $52,500 will be exhausted by the award of that tribunal.

Why is it that the claim of these physicians should not go before a probate tribunal, as the claim in the case of any other dead man? Why is it that here now, without proof, without anything except an amendment put on an appropriation bill, this question is taken away from a committee of Congress and sent to a few officers of the Departments who can pursue their own mode, make an ex parte examination if they choose to do so, never cross-examine a single witness; being no court under the safeguards of the law or the practice of the law, but an irresponsible tribunal, subject to all the influences which can be so subtly used in cases of this sort by an ingenious and talented claimant? I say these physicians are no better and no worse than the average claimant who comes to the Treasury of the country demanding relief.

What safeguard is there for the Government in the adjudication of this case? Who represents the Government? What law binds the officers named; what rule of testimony? They take the case and make the award; the money goes from the Treasury of the people up to a certain amount as certainly and irrevocably as I stand here to-day.

Mr. President, not one scintilla of testimony was taken by the committee in the House of Representatives, not one particle of proof, legally speaking, to show that Dr. Bliss ever administered a single draught to the dying President, or ever used a probe on that pus cavity. This report was made, I am authorized to say, "out of hand," to use a Western expression, without one particle of testimony in regard to it.

We are told by the Senator from Maine, "Hush; tread quietly and silently near the grave of Garfield; we want no examination." Sir, I deny that a claim like this touches the memory or the ashes of the dead President. I have my convictions in regard to his treatment, which are such that I would absolutely refuse to give any such amount to these people for any such service. If in the practice of my own profession I had tried a case and tried the wrong issue from beginning to end, withered be my arm and palsied my tongue if I should ever stand up and ask $15,000 or $50,000 for such a blunder.

It is no question of poultice and pill and injection; it is a question of material handling and physical evidence; for I say the surgeon who does not know the structure of the human body, and who treats one part when the wound is in another, is like the carpenter who knows not cellar from garret, or the shipwright who knows not the mast from the hull. He is a quack. I do not care what his evidence on paper is; there is no excuse for it. For eighty days James A. Garfield lay and sweltered and agonized and suffered. Bulletin after bulletin went to the anxious hearts and ears of the American people. "We probed the wound; we have found the bullet; the electric machinery responds under the great laws of nature until we have located the bullet to a hair's breadth;" and he died with the far-off look in his eye across the dim and distant ocean, and the autopsy showed that they never came within a foot of the bullet, and that they doctored and probed and lanced the pus cavity for eighty long days, and the amendment proposes to give over $50,000 for this exemplification of scientific skill. Sir, I shall not do it, for one.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I am not responsible for going into this field of the past and opening up the subject-matters which roll so freely from the tongue of the Senator from Missouri. I have no such desire, and the Committee on Appropriations have had no such desire.

There are some things that it is fitting should be said here and now. To begin with, the committee has had jurisdiction of this subject ever since last December, when bills presenting it were introduced here and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, upon whose files they have remained since. Yet the committee was in no hot haste to act or to bring forth premature action before the Senate, because in the other branch of Congress a special committee had been raised to consider the subject, for the reason that there is no legal claim, there is no tribunal anywhere under the sun before which any man who furnished ice, or cooling apparatus, or any of the things that were necessary to make that precious life more comfortable in those dreadful days could present a claim to be paid.

There is no court, probate or otherwise, before which these claims could be presented as against the Government. Therefore, in accordance with, as I supposed, common consent and a general feeling throughout the country, not only were bills introduced here and sent to the Committee on Appropriations, which has charge of the revenues of the Government in their expenditures, but in the House a special committee was raised. The Committee on Appropriations has waited for action on the part of that committee till now in the waning days of the session the Committee on Appropriations sees that this subject-matter is likely to be given the go-by entirely, and that nothing is to be done, so that the legitimate claims upon the Government which every man, even the Senator from Missouri, will admit exists, are likely to be passed by without any provision being made for them, after the report of the special committee of the House has lain upon the table for months, and there is no immediate prospect that it will be taken up. Therefore, the Committee on Appropriations has submitted this section of the bill as a quietus of this whole matter, taking it from the domain of discussion here, referring it to dignified and exalted officers of the Government, the three leading subordinate officers in the Treasury Department, to consider all of these claims.

I do not propose in any discussion here to be made the medium of the jealousy or spite of any man. If there be any man who believes that he did not have his part and parcel in attending upon the President in those last days, with him I have nothing to do. That is not a fit thing to be discussed here. Whether one man was kept out of attendance in the beginning, or another man was put in, is not a thing that we can deal with. That the President was struck down and that all hearts and all eyes turned to him, and that the occasion stood imminent where the most skillful services that could be invoked should be invoked, was admitted by everybody.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator permit me a second? I hope I do not understand the Senator from Maine to say that I represent any disaffected physician here. I state now once for all that I have never directly, indirectly, by word of mouth, by letter, or in any other way had any communication with any physician on this subject. What I say here I say on my own volition and responsibility, and I simply know what is known to the public, and comment upon it as a public man.

Mr. HALE. What I wish to say, and was going to say when the Senator rose, was that the Committee on Appropriations has not been approached, either as a committee or through its individual members, by any of the physicians who are named in the House report, or by any who by chance might be considered as having any claim. I have heard no word from one of these men; not one of them has been to the committee; not one of them has rung at my door-bell; not one of them, so far as I know, has made out a bill and presented it to the Government. But the committee has recognized what I believe, whether the Senator from Missouri agrees with me or not, is a general expectation on the part of the American people that there shall be proper compensation made for the long days and the long nights, the unceasing vigils, the attendance that never wavered, and the execution of the best skill that the physicians were capable of in that great case.

Does the Senator know that in any case in any way like this in any other country, where there has been great anxiety about a ruler in a monarchy or a president in a republic, whatever the result has been, whether the chances of life and death were at last cast in favor of life or death, the people always have recognized the services of the attending physicians? There was no end to the honors and emoluments and rank that could be conferred by the British people through its Parliament upon the physicians who attended upon George the Third in the days of his malady.

Mr. VEST. He recovered.

Mr. HALE. There also never was a time, if the Senator will go back to the records of those days, when he will not find that the British public was divided as to the skill or lack of skill bestowed upon that monarch.

The committee in dealing with this question has sought to avoid extravagance in the appropriation of the money of the people to pay these physicians. The report of the House committees provides that $85,000 shall be paid to Drs. Bliss, Agnew, Hamilton, Reyburn, and Boynton, and Dr. Susan Edson. The Committee on Appropriations, on such discussion and investigation as it was able to give to this matter, concluded that the sum was too large; that so much was not needed, and cut it down 30 per cent. or more to $52,500. It did not believe and does not now believe that the Senate or the House of Representatives is a proper tribunal to apportion and award that money to the different physicians. I do not think that the Senate is such a tribunal as should consider such questions, or that the House of Representatives is.

Mr. GARLAND. In view of an amendment which I expect to offer to this paragraph, I should like to ask the Senator from Maine a question right here, if it does not disturb the course of his argument. Upon what testimony or state of facts, if any, did the committee reach the conclusion that $52,500 should be paid these physicians, and that $75,000 would be commensurate with the entire amount of the claim?

Mr. HALE. So far as the claims aside from medical attendance and service go, the amounts were easily ascertained, because the bills have been filed. That disposes of the Senator's question so far as the balance above the $52,500 goes. The bills are all filed to cover that amount. So far as the $52,500 was reached by the committee, I am bound to say to the Senator that that was simply an expression of the judgment of the committee, because a limitation was needed and the committee did not think it suitable that this should be sent to a tribunal with no limitation.

Mr. GARLAND. I do not want to interrupt the course of the argument of the Senator, but I want to offer an amendment in good faith directly. Does the Senator remember now the entire amount of all the claims that were filed outside of the medical services? We have them here, I believe.

Mr. HALE. I have a memorandum here of just the whole amount. It is twenty-one thousand and odd dollars, aside from the doctors.

With this view, Mr. President—and I do not mean to occupy much time of the Senate—the Committee on Appropriations, to settle this matter, to end it so that it shall never be heard of again, has provided for this tribunal to hear the doctors and to hear any other testimony necessary to throw light upon the subject-matter. If the amendment prevails and this tribunal enters upon this work and makes its award and issues its certificates and the money is paid to the doctors and to the claimants I believe that the American people will be profoundly satisfied. I do not think that many men care to go back now to rake up and dig up any of the questions that arose by that death-bed.

The Senator from Missouri has concluded, I am bound to believe, from a profound examination and investigation, that the whole course of medical attendance on that dread occasion was a stupendous blunder. He may know that; he talks as if he does know it. I do not. I do not claim to be so profoundly skilled in the treatment of the human frame under such conditions as to set my judgment against that of those who give days and nights and who can have but one object, and that is to bring the sufferer out of danger into life instead of into death, and who never have from the earliest day down to the present time admitted that their whole course was what the Senator calls it, a stupendous blunder. But there is no good discussing that. There is no good in going back.

That these physicians gave attendance as faithful, as earnest, as laborious as men could do nobody doubts. That they were men who stood high in the profession and had gained a reputation by long years of illustrious services as great practitioners everybody admits. That they gave their time, day and night, to this great case the Senator will not deny. Notwithstanding his opinion that it was all a stupendous blunder, I believe that the American people generally to-day have the belief that the President, from the day when he fell in the station in Washington, was a doomed man and that it was beyond the power of human intervention to bring back that great life so fraught with the fortunes and destinies of the country. But whether that be so or not, what avails it that we here should bring these things up and discuss them? What boots it to any interest whatever that we should go and rake that over and bring it up and make it a part of the discussion of this question?

That the physicians are entitled to liberal, generous pay nobody will deny. That one man believes that the scale should be that fixed by the House committee, and another man believes that it should be that fixed by the Senate committee, and another man believes that it should be a lower scale, we are all aware; and how shall it be so well settled as by selecting three impartial men, who shall take this question into the retiracy of some room where all the testimony can be heard, and, giving such time as need be, shall bring out a result which shall be just and approved by the American people?

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment, two amendments, really. In lines 4 and 5 of section 6, I move to strike out the words "and the determination of all allowances," and in line 7, after the word "examine," to insert:

All of said claims and proposed allowances, and take the testimony in each, and certify the same, with all papers connected therewith, with their opinion as to the justice of each and all of such claims, to the President of the United States, to be by him laid before Congress at its next annual session.

And then strike out the remainder of the section. The amendments which I have suggested if adopted would make the clause read thus:

That a board of audit, consisting of the First and Second Comptrollers of the Treasury and the Treasurer of the United States, is hereby constituted, to whom shall be referred all claims to be made growing out of the illness and burial of the late President, James A. Garfield; that the said board shall hear and examine all of said claims and proposed allowances, and take the testimony in each, and certify the same, with all papers connected therewith, with their opinion as to the justice of each and all of such claims, to the President of the United States, to be by him laid before Congress at its next annual session.

The Senate has determined that the committee's amendment is not obnoxious to the objection that it is general legislation. Not believing in that decision, I however yield to it, and offer this amendment to make the section more perfect, and as I consider better adapted to the purposes for which the section is to be inserted in the bill. It is, as the Senator from Maine has stated, of course a delicate step, but of such is life made. It is unpleasant to see our friends and families sick, and to see them die; but still we have to submit to it, and we have to submit to paying the expenses of their sickness and their death and their burial. It will not do, in the hurried march of the events of human life, to linger long by the grave of departed friends. Probably we all do too much of that.

This is a business transaction at last, affecting the Government directly, affecting the interest of these claimants most directly, affecting the sense of justice of the civilized world, and putting to test that science that I call the remedial and curative science, the science of medicine.

It will not do, in my judgment, to undertake to settle these claims by half-way testimony or by no testimony at all. It will not do for us to jump at a conclusion in reference to this matter. If the late President had been a private citizen, or possibly anybody less than the President of the United States, these persons would have been compelled to have gone into the surrogate or probate court at the place of his residence to establish these claims, and as tender and delicate as the duty may be we must consider it in that light and in none other.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask, as the Senator has repeated what the Senator from Missouri said as to the law in Ohio, if claims against a perfectly solvent estate of a deceased person are prosecuted in the surrogate or probate courts?

Mr. GARLAND. I do not know.

Mr. HOAR. It is not the law with us. It would be a suit tried before a jury, like any disputed claim.

Mr. GARLAND. I do not know as to that. The jurisdiction may not be that in Ohio; I am not posted in that respect; but I am stating the general proposition. It would go into the court where the estate of Mr. Garfield would be administered in the first instance; that is all I meant to say; you may call it any term you please.

Mr. HOAR. It would be settled by a lawsuit against the executors.

Mr. GARLAND. The probate court in my State has jurisdiction of that kind of claim, with the right of appeal and trial by jury.

Mr. HOAR. It is not so in my State, and is not so in Ohio.

Mr. GARLAND. I hope the Senator understands the point.

Mr. VEST. In the Western States it would go before the probate court.

Mr. GARLAND. Yes, with the right of appeal to the circuit court; and in that controversy, whether it went into the surrogate's or probate or orphans' court, whatever you choose to call it, every question of legitimate defense would come up as to the length of service, the reasonableness of the bill, the competency of the person performing the service, and so on. The defendant would have the right to plead his set-off, his recoupment, or what not. He could claim any defect resulting from the want of attention, from malpractice, from mispractice, ignorance, or anything else.

As delicate as it may be, I do not propose to pass to a vote on this matter until I have testimony satisfactory to me upon those points. At the same time I want every person who administered to the President in his last illness, who cooled his brow or made him rest more comfortably, or who contributed to prolong his days upon this earth, paid every cent that in reason and law and justice he is entitled to receive.

I waive the question entirely that the minority of the committee of the House makes, that there is no law for paying for the medical attendance and the medical services performed for the late President. There is a point to be made upon that, but I do not choose to make it, and I waive it, that he being Commander-in-Chief, whether the doctors who belong to the Army were not compelled to wait upon him and attend him; but I do not care for that. I wish to pay them every dollar that they earned, but not one dollar more.

I asked the Senator from Maine, in the best of faith, by what criterion the committee reached the sum of $52,000 for medical services and allowances. When the committee comes here with these bills curtailed, there is established at once, to begin with, the opinion that some of these claims in some of their amounts are unjust and improper.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator desire me to answer him now?

Mr. GARLAND. I said I propounded the question to the Senator in the course of his remarks, which he answered, as I understood him.

Mr. HALE. I thought the Senator was asking me for a more definitive statement.

Mr. GARLAND. No; I simply stated the question to which the Senator responded.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will turn to page 5 of the report of the House select committee he will find that in making up their sum at the head of their list stands Dr. Bliss.

Mr. GARLAND. I have seen that, and I am going to refer to it in a moment.

Mr. HALE. I was going to tell the Senator that that report gives Dr. Bliss $25,000; Dr. Agnew $15,000; Dr. Hamilton $15,000; Dr. Reyburn $10,000; Dr. Boynton $10,000; Dr. Susan Edson $10,000. The Committee on Appropriations thought that that whole scale was too high, and taking that basis of $85,000 we cut the total down to $52,500, but of course the basis that we started upon in order to move from was that fixed by the House committee.

Mr. GARLAND. That is precisely upon what the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations is based. Here come six physicians, whom we wish to reward amply, and they claim $10,000 more than the entire amount of $75,000 limited by this section.

Mr. ALLISON. Will it disturb the Senator if I interrupt him?

Mr. GARLAND. Not in the least, because I want to get information.

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand all the facts to be, the physicians named in the House report absolutely disclaimed any pretense of presenting a bill. They made no claim to the House of Representatives, and expressly refused to make any claim for any sum whatever; so that there is no claim of any physicians in either House.

Mr. GARLAND. But where do the Senator and the committee come in possession of the items making the $75,000? That is like the man who went up to a bar when it was not permitted to sell whisky. He asked for a drink and took it, and said, "What shall I pay?" The barkeeper said, "We cannot take anything." The man replied, "I am very much obliged to you; I will not pay anything;" and he retired. Yet these parties are willing to take something, and I ask the Senator from Iowa the question, where does he get the items making $25,000, $15,000, $15,000, $10,000, and $10,000?

Mr. HALE. From the House committee's report.

Mr. GARLAND. Where did the House committee get them? I am at a loss to understand this matter. It did not fall out of the clouds; it did not spring like a vapor from the earth. There must have been an account presented somewhere or some time or other, and we want to know the facts.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will read the House report he will find that in one portion of it they discuss the question of the great fees received by eminent physicians and surgeons in private cases, and they go on considering that in some cases physicians receive as much as $1,000 a day; and taking all of these things together, the importance of the case, its critical nature, and its responsibility, the House committee arrived at that scale.

Mr. GARLAND. Then I want to know the facts upon which that was done, because, presto, change, from one end of the Capitol to the other, here comes a committee that strikes down the allowances of the House committee and reduces the aggregate to but little over one-half what the House committee allowed for the leading physician. Where is the evidence? It is the facts I want to get at. I want to get at the facts on which the committees of both Houses have acted. If you can strike down the account of Dr. Bliss to nearly one-half, why may you not strike it all out? Why can you not, if you are going upon that ground, say you will give him only $10,000, and strike Dr. Edson down to $2,500?

This is a proceeding, confessedly by both the Senators, that must be based upon facts. It is the facts that we want. If these physicians have earned $25,000 apiece let them have it; if they have earned $100,000 let them have it; but no more. I am unwilling to slap these physicians in the face in this kind of style. Fifty-two thousand five hundred dollars of the entire sum is proposed to be paid to the physicians, when the House committee recommends the sum of $85,000. The House committee recommends claims for over $120,000, and the Senate committee brings the total down to $75,000. I want to understand the facts and the figures upon which that recommendation was based. Forty-five thousand dollars is now cut away from the amount.

Look where this is going to operate. Look where it is going to damage. It will probably not affect the large attendants, but here is a number of small claims for attendants and attention to the President in his last illness, upon page 6 of the report of the House. They have got to contribute their pro rata of reduction as a matter of course, and they will be the sufferers in the distribution of this money, but not the large claimants like the physicians.

Therefore I want this to go before a board simply to take testimony and send it to the Congress of the United States to pass upon. Congress is the only proper arbiter, in my opinion, under the laws and Constitution that can pass upon this case. There may be a long delay; it may be some time before it is completed; but let us do justice to all parties. At most the amendment reported by the committee makes the limit January, 1883, and we may have before that time the entire report in the hands of the President and laid before Congress, so that it may act upon it on the testimony and the facts in each case.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question about the first portion of his amendment? He moves to strike out in line 5 the words "all allowances," I understand.

Mr. GARLAND. I move first to strike out, in lines 4 and 5, the words "and the determination of all allowances."

Mr. HALE. Let me explain to the Senator why those words were put in. They were inserted for the very reason stated by the Senator from Iowa, that the physicians have declined to make out bills and present them against the Government. They say "we ought not to be asked to measure our services here; it is a matter of public repute; everybody understands it; and to ask us to measure ourselves and fix a scale is more than should be done." Therefore they do not present their bills, and the committee has put in those words in order to give the tribunal jurisdiction in cases where no bills are presented.

Mr. GARLAND. The explanation is not satisfactory, with due deference to the Senator, because the purport of my amendment is simply to make this a board of inquiry as to the testimony and the facts; to make it simply what you would be held down to under the law by the meaning of the word "audit," not that they shall pass judgment upon the question. When you send a claim into a court of equity to be audited, or when you direct an account in the administration of an estate to be audited, the finding of the auditor is not final; it is simply something upon which the chancellor or probate judge is to act. I want these gentlemen to audit first upon testimony, and then to send their auditing and their testimony to Congress, for Congress to say whether we shall pay it or not, and when and how it shall be paid. That is what I am after; and the action of the committee here makes it absolutely necessary, because we see that they take the report of the other House and cut it down $45,000 upon the entire sum. They are not satisfied with that, and I for one am not satisfied with the reason they present here for doing it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does the Senator think our committee has made the amount too small?

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator from Missouri has asked me a very good question. I am sorry to say to him that I cannot answer it, because I have no facts upon which to predicate my judgment, and I do not believe the committee had any. The Senator from Missouri asked me if I believed the committee made it too small. I have no facts upon which to base a judgment upon that point, and therefore my judgment would be worth nothing; but I want to see whether the Senate committee did cut it down too much, and whether the House committee made it too large. I want to see just exactly the facts pertaining to this whole matter.

Public repute, as stated by the Senator from Maine, will not answer, because I say to him that if public repute is to figure in this matter and is to answer, the widow and children of Mr. Garfield ought to pursue those doctors to their graves to recover damages and every other remedy that may be placed in their hands by the laws of the land. That is my judgment upon it so far, but I withhold my judgment until I can get the facts upon which to base it.

One week before that man was carried to his final resting-place they said they had found the ball in his right groin, and used a term that I could not find in any medical dictionary that I hunted the town here for. When the ball was found it appeared, according to the size of the President, eighteen inches from the place they had located it. According to the telegrams at that time, if he had had sufficient strength they would have cut for that ball, but he lived only seven or eight days after that. If public repute is to settle the question as to these physicians, I vote not one dollar; yet I want to pay them. It is a crucible through which the testing of these questions must pass.

I waive the question, as I said, as to the law in regard to paying anything at all. I am willing to pay what is established as right and proper, but I am not willing to exempt these claimants from the ordinary law in the country requiring claimants to prove the justice or their claims. The dispatches that went out every day that the President was better to-day, and would be up to-morrow, that he would be around about the next day, only befooled the world, only gulled the unsuspecting and illiterate of the country. It was like the doctor who, when a young fellow had been thrown from his horse, went and examined him and reported to his mother in his medical way in reply to her question what was the matter with him. A neighbor came a little while after and said, "Mrs. Smith, what is the matter with Johnny?" She replied, "Oh, well, the doctor says, there is not much the matter with him; he has got a slight confusion of his abominable parts; that is all;" when the doctor had really told her that he had a slight contusion in the abdominal parts; and the poor woman lived and died not knowing any difference between the phrase she employed and what was absolutely stated by the doctor. This was the kind of public repute, this healthy and commendable pus that Garfield was discharging every day, and these telegrams that were befooling the country, these false hopes that were raised that to-day he was better and to-morrow he would certainly be up and about his business, that to-day he ate a little beef and it may be drank a little beef tea, and all that.

Mr. President, painful as it may be, this is business, and I want to make it business. If these doctors have passed through this crucible, and there is an attempt to fix any amount, I will vote every dollar they are entitled to, every solitary cent, but we cannot ascertain it except through a direct and legal investigation by some tribunal or other.

The two committees themselves stand as far apart almost as the two poles. They are wide asunder upon this proposition. According to the report of the House somebody is to lose $45,000 if we adopt this measure. How are you going to make that distribution without testimony? My amendment institutes a fair and legitimate inquiry for these claims to be presented to the board of audit and the testimony taken and sent to Congress at the next session, when it will be time for Congress to pass its judgment upon the claims.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, this is to me a painful discussion, an indescribably painful discussion, and I know it is to the great mass of the American people. The surgeons and physicians who had that case in charge had the profound sympathy of their professional friends and the good people all over the country; and they are entitled here at least in common charity to kind and courteous treatment. I insist that no man has any justification, in the evidence before the two Houses or anywhere else, for reflection upon their personal character or upon their motives. There have never been since the world of science began men more seriously and painfully and awfully anxious to do their whole duty than were all the men and women gathered about that bedside, and the electric wire quivered minute by minute with suggestions from all their professional brethren throughout the land who had a voice worthy of being heard.

I personally know but one of those gentlemen, and I must say a word in his behalf. I have known Dr. Bliss at least twenty years. He had a most extraordinary experience in the war. He had under charge, within sight of this window, the Armory Square Hospital, and sometimes there were three or four buildings filled with hundreds, and, at times, thousands of the most desperately-wounded cases brought up here from the Wilderness and Cold Harbor, and kindred fields. Going through those hospitals from day to day, which were all under his general command and direction, he was called on time and again, and was qualified if a man ever was, to perform great operations.

I do not pretend to discuss the skill displayed or the lack of skill in that dreadful time, but I do believe that the great mass of the profession throughout the world think these men pursued on the whole a course such as they would have pursued if they had been there. I believe the most eminent men in that profession in this country and the Old World are not now passing censure upon these gentlemen or alluding to them as unworthy members of the profession or blunderers in their treatment. I believe they have the charitable and respectful consideration of all the members of that profession everywhere.

A very painful point has been made here as to whether Dr. Bliss was entitled to be in the case or was lawfully employed. I do not discuss it for one moment. He was called there by the Secretary of War. He spent the whole eighty days by that bedside. At any hour or moment of all that time, day or night, he would have left that house never to return again upon the least suggestion of those in authority; nobody doubts it. He remained; he was allowed to remain; he was urged to be there; he was sent for at any hour of the day or night; he spent the whole time there; he wasted his strength and his constitution there. I am the last man to judge him harshly, nor will I sit by when his motives are improperly impugned.

I think the committee is entitled to thanks from the public in general for the reasonable and proper course it has suggested for us.

I beg that the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas may not be adopted. Who desires to have a volume of testimony brought in here covering the daily treatment of that case? Who desires that we shall open our technical arsenals here and talk about a quantum meruit, about the hours employed, the miles traveled, and bring in expert testimony as to the character of skill displayed by these men? I hope we may have an end of it. I hope this matter may go to a reasonable and proper tribunal, such as is suggested, and whatever the award is that we shall pay it. If any man has a secret belief that it might well have been $15 less or twenty-five cents more, I hope he will hold his tongue forever.

If the kind of discussion that we have had here is to go on in the Senate now, and to be renewed on the report of that board, and to be renewed again in the House, I beg this Congress to take the whole matter out of these Halls. Let us shut our mouths forever. We can easily go to some of the gentlemen of this land of means and beg a hundred thousand dollars to pay these claims and silence them, and have history close this chapter now. It cannot be a creditable one to the American Congress that this thing is made a matter of party strife or of personal abuse, or of continued investigation into that sacred grave. Let us come away from that body. Come away from it, and do not invite hungry pettifoggers to be thrusting their filthy fingers into those sacred bones. Let us have an end of this case.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I wish to express my thanks to the Committee on Appropriations for the very judicious disposition which they seem to me to have made of this delicate and unpleasant matter. I understand there are two things which ought to be accomplished by legislation on this subject at this time. The first is the one which I understand the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Arkansas do not desire to accomplish—I do desire to accomplish it and so, I believe, do the vast majority of the American people of all parties—and that is, that these claims shall not be presented to the widow or children of the dead President.

The Senator from Missouri thinks it would be fitting that these doctors and nurses and undertakers should go to Ohio and bring a suit against the executors: for that is, as I am told, the only remedy in that State, as it would be in mine; those executors being the widow of the deceased President and her brother. Now, think of it. Think of it, Senator from Missouri! Are you in earnest when you propose that these disputed questions which you have discussed shall be litigated by that lady and her brother before a tribunal in the State of Ohio? I believe that on reflection my honorable and generous friend would rather pay the whole claim out of his own pocket, if he were able to do it, than have such a thing happen.

The first and great object of this provision is that the expenses of this sickness and burial shall be defrayed by the American people, and that none of that distressed family shall ever be compelled to hear of them again. That is the first and the great thing that the committee do. The next thing to be accomplished is that the investigation shall be taken out of the public eye, and shall be taken from the two Houses of Congress, as unfit a tribunal as you can conceive to deal with such questions, and shall be referred to a tribunal of three officers, whose duty and practice it is to protect the Treasury and cut down exorbitant claims, with whom they will be entirely safe. I think the committee have acted wisely, if that were the only thing to be accomplished. These things ought to be got out of Congress, got out of the public consideration.

I desire, Mr. President, to move an amendment to come in at the end of the section which will make perfectly clear that the section accomplishes what I understand to be its great and principal object:

And provided further, That no claim shall be considered under this section unless the person filing the same shall file a release under seal of all claims against the representatives of the late President growing out of the said illness and burial.

Mr. INGALLS. Is that in order now? An amendment in the second degree is now pending.

Mr. HOAR. It is an amendment to a different part of the section.

Mr. GARLAND. The amendment that I offer strikes out all that portion of the section, and the question will come up first on my amendment.

Mr. HOAR. The vote will not be taken on mine until the Senator's is disposed of, of course.

Mr. SHERMAN. The only feeling I wish to express in this debate is a strong desire that this matter may be settled now without further controversy and without more discussion than is necessary. I believe with the Senator from Massachusetts that it would be very unpleasant and, I think, disgraceful to the American people to have these bills presented in the ordinary way against the executrix of the late President. She is in no condition to decide upon these matters. It would involve with her questions of peculiar delicacy.

Undoubtedly each of these parties, especially the physicians who were called in to attend the President in his last sickness, has a legal claim, not against the United States, not against the people of the United States, but against the estate of the deceased; and yet every one of us would be shocked if the people of the United States would not meet this claim and pay it, whatever it is. It would be disgraceful to our country to have this matter presented to the executrix with a view to have it diminish the estate of the deceased. President Garfield died in the service of his country, as much so as any soldier that fell in war. He was killed because he was President; he suffered because he was President; and therefore these expenses should be paid by the country just as the expenses of a battle-field are paid, and they should never be presented to the private estate of the deceased. I hope, therefore, that this will be settled now.

Upon one point I sympathize a little with the Senator from Missouri. I think the bills made out in favor of these physicians, not by them, are grossly exorbitant, and if presented against a private citizen they would be hooted at. I believe that the allowance made by the House committee for eighty days' service, or whatever was the time employed, is amply sufficient to pay the annual compensation of each one of these physicians, eminent as they may be; and I do not think it is exactly the thing either for us to allow or for these physicians to receive an extraordinary pay for this professional service.

I like the proposition submitted by the Committee on Appropriations. It refers this controversy to a tribunal that is impartial and fair, that will be just and liberal. These are the same officers that pass upon all claims against the United States. The two Comptrollers pass annually upon claims amounting to two or three hundred million dollars. They may, therefore, properly be left to decide finally this claim. They are independent officers, entirely independent of the President; they pass upon his pay as well as upon that of others; they are independent of the head of the Department to which they belong; they are men eminent in ability. These three officers therefore will probably render what would be the fair and average judgment of the American people, and whatever decision they make I hope will be final, never to be reported to Congress for revision, but paid out of the Treasury, published in the public expenditures, and closed forever. That is the only wish I have. It will be, as a matter of course, paid out of the public Treasury and reported in the general expenses of the Government.

If I voted for any amendment of this proposition I would vote to reduce the compensation allowed to the physicians to about one-half what is allowed by the committee; and that would be a higher pay than these gentlemen would receive in the ordinary course of their professional duties, although they live in the largest cities of the country. If anybody chooses to submit a proposition to reduce the amount of allowance made to these physicians I will vote for it cheerfully. I think an allowance of $25,000 would be liberal, giving to each of them a larger daily pay than he would actually earn in his profession either in New York, Philadelphia, or Washington. When you come to divide up the amount allowed to these physicians, or that would be included in the allowance of $52,500, it is a larger daily compensation than these physicians would receive anywhere practicing in the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I intend at the proper time to offer an amendment to reduce this $52,500 very largely. I did not catch exactly the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio. I think the amount ought to be reduced, and propose to offer an amendment to reduce it. How much was the amount the Senator from Ohio thought ought to be allowed?

Mr. SHERMAN. I should vote to allow them $25,000. I think that fairly divided among these physicians would be a larger compensation than they could possibly have earned in their profession if General Garfield had never been wounded by the assassin.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire to ask a question of the Senator from Ohio. From the nature of his remarks the Senator seems to have the impression that the sum fixed by this committee is to be the sum which this board are to allow, that the only power which they have is to divide the $52,500 as in their judgment may seem best. Now, do I understand that to be the intent and purpose of the committee, to fix the sum at $52,500 and the only power this board has is, not to adjudicate as to the amount of professional services, but merely to divide it according as their judgment dictates among the claimants? Is that the proposition?

Mr. SHERMAN. The allowance made by Congress under this section would be $52,500 for medical attendance on the President, and we know the natural effect of such an allowance by Congress would be to cause that sum to be divided among the physicians. When you fix a maximum in a bill, the accounting officers usually take that maximum as the sum to be allowed, although in some cases they do not. I have no doubt these commissioners would feel themselves instructed, as the amount is fixed at the sum of $52,500, to divide that sum among the different physicians.

As to the suggestion with regard to testimony, let me say that this is not a question of testimony. The Senator from Arkansas wants testimony in this matter. I hope these commissioners will not take any testimony at all. Every citizen of the United States able to read and write has got a pretty good idea of the nature and character of the services rendered. They cannot decide between the doctors on a controverted question, but all the facts are known; they are matters of history. We do not want proof, oral or written, to show a matter of history like the death of General Garfield, the circumstances that led to his death, his long sickness; they are engraven on the mind of every man and woman who is able to read, and every one has an opinion of his own. Every member of Congress is just as able now to fix a reasonable limit to the amount of money to be paid to these surgeons as he would be after hearing tomes of testimony, and probably is better able to do it.

I hope, therefore, and if I felt that I was justified by my position as a Senator from the State from which General Garfield came I would appeal to the Senate to settle this matter now, not to let it go into the settlement of his estate in Ohio. Under our laws in Ohio funeral expenses are the first things paid; they are required to be paid promptly, and that is the first disposition of the estate. The matter ought to be settled promptly by Congress. To allow it to remain open would only embarrass the settlement of the estate. We surely can decide the amount we are willing to allow. I do not believe that any of these surgeons will repudiate or refuse to receive the amount that may be allowed. None of them has claimed any money; they have all acted honorably. No man has ever mentioned the subject to me; I have never heard a word about it except in public debate; and I think the physicians by that course, if in no other way, have earned the respect of the American people in awaiting the action of Congress on this subject, and whatever that action is I have no doubt they will at once concur. Let us settle it now to-day, and then forever after dismiss this unpleasant subject from the debates of Congress and, if possible, from our recollections and thoughts.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, I think this debate illustrates the wisdom of the proposition made by the Committee on Appropriations. The questions suggested by the Senator from Arkansas will be just as pertinent a year from now as they are now. We shall have just as much controversy next January as to the relative merit and actual merit of all these surgeons as we have now, and we shall never be in a better condition to settle it than we are now, because, as the Senator from Ohio well says, it is not to be settled by testimony at all.

If the Senator from Arkansas were called on to-day to say what should be a reasonable fee for arguing a case in the Supreme Court he would not want the testimony of a lot of attorneys as to what had been paid in some other case. He would know it himself and would state it himself, and would vote for the proper amount on his judgment as a legislator and a man.

Mr. GARLAND. I should have to know the facts.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Arkansas would not have any more facts in that case than he has now in his head; than he has at all times with him for the purpose of discharging every duty that devolves on him as an attorney and as a legislator, and he would not ask it. If he were to get all the reports which could be made by comptrollers, by professional and by unprofessional men, he would never be any nearer a conclusion than he is now. In fact he expressed a very decided one a moment ago, which satisfied me that he not only does not need testimony but that he has made up his mind in advance of testimony.

Mr. GARLAND. Oh, no. I stated in answer to the Senator from Maine, who said that the public mind had already fixed this amount, that I would not vote any claim on that ground.

Mr. PLUMB. There will never happen anything that will modify the public repute in the Senator's opinion. There is no single fact in this case that can ever have one single ray of light thrown upon it that has not been thrown upon it now.

In regard to the question of skill, of course there may be a thousand differences of opinion about it: but the highest judgment that was ever expressed in favor of a fellow-citizen anywhere was expressed in a Western community when they buried a man under the sod there and put over his tomb-stone, "He did his level best," and that is all that you can say for anybody. These men did their level best, and I think their level best was worth a little more than it would have been if it had been rendered in the service to a private individual; and why? Because the intelligence, the judgment, the sympathy of the entire world were acting upon these men; they were under a stress, mental, professional, physical, which could not have attached to them in any way if they had been dealing with the case of a private individual stricken as the President was.

This takes it out of the domain of the ordinary transactions affecting the relations of physicians to their patients; and more than all that, we are dealing here in the light of a public judgment, deliberately formed, and expressed as distinctly as any public judgment ever has been, that we shall pay these bills in some way. This is a Government of public sentiment. We are here to respond to it in a decent and reasonable way. It is expected that we shall pay these bills. It is not expected that we are going to higgle about them; that we shall, as the Senator from Connecticut well said, open up that grave; that we shall dig into it, ghoul-like, and see whether or not this man did his duty or that man did his duty, or whether the other one did his duty relatively to some third person. We are expected to pay these bills in some way.

Now, suppose we had these items before us, suppose it was proposed to pay Dr. Bliss $25,000—and I believe that sum has been mentioned in a casual way—Dr. Hamilton $15,000, some other person $15,000, and some other person $15,000, the judgment to be expressed by the Senate would correspond in a large degree with the present feeling of the persons expressing it. It would have no other basis than that. The moment we get away from that which can be proven, as the Senator from Arkansas says, in a court of justice, we have nothing except fancy to govern ourselves by; and so one man would say "Dr. Bliss was no better than Dr. Hamilton, and I think on the whole he did not render any more service. Dr. Agnew is not any better than Dr. Hamilton, he is just as good; Mrs. Edson, being a woman, is a great deal better." And the result would be that we should have a bill that would be out of all proportion to the actual services rendered. Congress is the last body in the world to settle that kind of question. It cannot be done judiciously here or in the other branch.

Now, in regard to the question of limiting the amount, cutting it down, about which the Senator from Ohio spoke, I am not tenacious myself about that, and still I hope an amendment of that kind will not prevail. I say now the question of this amount is not half as much to be considered as the question of doing the thing which shall easiest and soonest and most completely close this entire controversy. If this question were submitted to the medical profession and we had them to say, each man for himself, what should be awarded, who can doubt the answer? Let any lawyer on this floor say what he thinks would be the judgment of lawyers as to a question of attorneys' fees, and they have been tried time out of time in the knowledge of every one here who has had to do with the trial of causes. Take an attorney and give to him a case of that kind and let him say what his judgment would be as to the fee to be paid, and it would be large enough.

Suppose, then, we were trying this question before the medical fraternity of the world, considering the character of the patient, the circumstances of the shooting, all the circumstances which surrounded the case, the great interest not only in this country but throughout the civilized world, the immense responsibility which it brought with it, not only care but accumulative care everywhere to all these men at all times; submit that to the medical profession of the world, and they would not higgle about this question; they would say whether it should be $1,000 more or less than a named sum was a matter of no consequence.

The service rendered was not only great because these men were professionally great, but it was great because of their immense responsibility; and the medical profession would say that we ought not to higgle about it. Let each one of us ask himself about that question when we go home to our people, let us submit it to the judgment of our consciences as legislators, and we must say that we ought not to higgle upon the question of pay. The American people will not justify it. We ought not to be wildly and widely extravagant, but we ought not on the other hand to be niggardly about it; we ought to do the fair and decent thing, if we do anything at all.

There is no claim, in the ordinary sense of the term, that we should pay anything. There is not a single item in this deficiency bill that could be preferred against the Government in a court of the United States. In one sense it is entirely a gratuity, and this is a gratuity; but it is a gratuity to be paid in deference, as I said, to this public judgment that has been expressed, this public judgment that expects Congress will pay the expenses of those eighty days of suffering, and that it will not only pay them but that it will pay them as it ought to pay them, with a decent degree of liberality, which ought to characterize the Congress of the United States in dealing with such a question.

So I hope, Mr. President, we shall not unwisely limit the discretion of the officers who are to pass on these claims in regard to the amount. A committee of the House had fixed $120,000 as the total sum, and the Senator from Arkansas says that he cannot accept the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, because it fixes a lower sum. He thinks the fact that we dissented from that judgment is evidence that our judgment ought not to be followed. But all human judgment is liable to result in a compromise on some point. The Senate committee looked at these items and thought them too large. They said, "Here is a response to a perhaps exaggerated idea of what public sentiment requires, and of what the professional services of these gentlemen were worth." Looking at it in a cooler way, in a calmer way, with a disposition on the whole to be somewhat economical, they said, "We will take what we consider the safer and the middle course; we will not fix the pay of these men at $85,000, and the gross sum at $120,000, but we will fix their pay at about $50,000, and we will put the whole sum at $75,000." That was a compromise, and all legislation and all recorded judgment which requires the assent of more than one person is always a compromise. This was a compromise. It seems to me to be a fair and a decent one. It seems to me in the first place to comport with the dignity of the occasion, with the responsibility that we are under, and with that sentiment of justice on the whole which we ought to feel ourselves liable to.

I think, Mr. President, that the solution offered in the committee amendment is one that not only is fair, but one which in the adoption of every member of the Senate will feel that he has done a decent and a creditable thing in voting for, taking it exactly as it is. Suppose it is too much; I hope I shall never have to reproach myself with anything worse than having voted too much for an object of that kind. I am willing to go back to my constituents under a reproach of that kind at least. Let it be too much. Let us deal with it, if we deal with it at all, in the spirit of a decent liberality. We have fixed a sum which is fair, which is reasonable, which will be regarded so everywhere. We cannot afford to be under the reproach of having done any less than that.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the Senator allow me one moment. I do not wish to interfere with this bill, but I would suggest that this debate has become so prolonged that it is time to apply the five-minute rule.

Mr. ALLISON. I will ask unanimous consent, if the Senate will allow me, to apply the five-minute rule to this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the five-minute rule of debate be applied to this bill. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I have no desire and shall not undertake to allude to the sad scene of that melancholy day when President Garfield fell. I had hoped that the amendment suggested by the Committee on Appropriations would be agreed to without any debate, or at least without a debate such as we have had upon it, and I would not rise now except to place upon record a correction of an apparent error. It has been alleged that the Committee on Appropriations have undertaken in this instance to do what they had no jurisdiction to do. I want to call the attention of the Senate, and also the attention of such members of the House as may find fault with our action, to the fact that early in this session, in December last, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] introduced a bill for the purpose of adjusting these claims, and sent that bill to the Committee on Appropriations by reference in the Senate. The Committee on Appropriations, after looking over the bill, asked me to make such investigation as I could make with reference to the amount that ought to be allowed, and I set myself about that business as early as December last, and called to my aid Colonel Rockwell and General Swaim, two intimate friends of General Garfield. I wrote to the Pennsylvania Railway Company and other parties that I supposed had bills against the Government or the estate of President Garfield, for the purpose of ascertaining the proper amount that we should put in some appropriation bill for the purpose of liquidating these expenditures.

I want to call the attention of Senators to the fact that we have jurisdiction in this body of appropriation bills. There is no limit in the Constitution as to our power of amendment. Having that jurisdiction, I endeavored as nearly as I could to ascertain the total amount that ought to be appropriated, and, as I said a moment ago, in trying to ascertain the amount I addressed a letter to the President of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, and I want that letter placed on record now for use of the Senate, and for the gratification I think it will be to the country to know the generosity with which that company has treated this question. I send the letter to the desk to be read.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD COMPANY, OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
Philadelphia, December 28, 1881.

MY DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your esteemed favor of the 25th instant, and beg leave to say in reply that our company had not at the time, nor have they now, any intention to make a claim for compensation for courtesies extended to our late President and his family, or to the Government.

We felt it to be not only a duty but a pleasure to do what we could to increase the comfort and aid in restoring the health of President Garfield.

Very truly, yours,

G. B. ROBERTS, President.

Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. ALLISON. I have felt it my duty to place on record this generous statement of the president of this railway company.

Mr. WINDOM. I am obliged to the Senator from Iowa for placing that on record, for I know well what was done by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company; but I should feel that I was not doing justice to another company did I not state that they tendered the use of their railroad free for any demands that might be made upon it. I mean the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company.

Mr. ALLISON. I only wish to add one word more. The committee may have erred in fixing the maximum amount to be paid to these physicians, but I do hope that the Senate will not reduce the amount by vote, but will leave that question to the eminent men who will have charge of the auditing of these expenses, the Treasurer and two Comptrollers of the Treasury.

A word further in partial response to what has been said on this floor with reference to these physicians. It is true that Dr. Bliss only occupied eighty days of time: but it is also true that Dr. Agnew, of Philadelphia, confessedly at the head of the profession of surgery in this country, was called from his home to a distant place and with fidelity and with courage followed up this case to the very end; and so of Dr. Hamilton, of New York City; and I ask if in the presence of the knowledge that we have of these eminent surgeons, who by a long life of study and practice and attention to the difficult and arduous profession of surgery have acquired great reputation for skill and ability, we are going to higgle here about daily compensation to such men when the patient was the President of the United States? Let others do as they will, but as for myself, I will put here a maximum compensation that will at least by the medical profession and by the other learned professions of our country be regarded as some compensation to the eminent men who engaged in this service and were called by telegraph at midnight on the 3d day of July, 1881, and who came here by special train for the purpose of rendering such services as they could render.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time is out.

Mr. ALLISON. I am much obliged to the President. I will only add one word more. I hope that the Senate in fixing this maximum amount will consider the character of the eminent men who attended the President during his illness, without regarding the question whether they were successful or not.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I do not question the jurisdiction of the committee to report this amendment to the bill. I would very much have preferred, however, inasmuch as the House had taken jurisdiction of this question and appointed a special committee to determine it and that committee had made a report, that it should have been left to the initiative of the House until it was prepared for action here in the Senate.

I sympathize almost entirely with what my colleague has said. There are points of delicacy and difficulty about this question. There are all those points that touch upon the tender and delicate relations of the family, still surviving, to the deceased. It would be a monstrous wrong and scandal that they should be troubled in the courts of Ohio by the claims of these physicians, and I am glad to have observed in the debate to-day that no Senator has indicated in the least degree that the settlement of this question should in any way be remitted to them; I mean in its pecuniary relations.

But after that is settled, after it is determined that the Congress of the United States shall stand between the family of the late President and those who are supposed to have claims for attendance upon him in his last sickness, then I say that pale of delicacy passes away and we are dealing with them, as has been already stated, either upon a contract or a quantum meruit.

When the Government of the United States steps in between the family of the deceased and those who have claims against it and declares that there shall be no annoyance or irritation to the family arising out of the painful scenes connected with his last illness and his death, then I say we are dealing with those who have claims against the estate of that family in an entirely business relation. I am willing to pay them for whatever services they rendered, pay them somewhat in relation to the anxiety occasioned by the position and elevation of their patient, pay them also for whatever they may have lost by reason of their attendance upon him, pay those who came from New York and Philadelphia in disregard of their ordinary practice, pay them all liberally, pay them well. I will higgle, to use the expression that has sometimes been used here to-day, with none of them upon a question of fair compensation; but when we get, as I said, to a question between the Government and these physicians or these nurses or anybody else who except for our intervention might have a claim against the personal estate of the President, then I will apply to them somewhat the same rules that we apply to ordinary claimants against the Government; and it is because I sympathize entirely with the idea that in one aspect this is a delicate and difficult question to deal with, and in the other aspect that it is not difficult and not delicate to deal with, that I shall be glad to vote for the amendment suggested by my colleague if anybody shall offer it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move, in line 20 of the amendment of the committee, to strike out "seventy-five thousand" and insert "fifty-two thousand five hundred," and in line 22 to strike out "fifty-two thousand five hundred" and insert "thirty-thousand." Now, let it be read with the amendment as it is proposed.

Mr. GARLAND. Does the Senator want to take the vote on his amendment before mine?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir; I prefer taking it now.

Mr. GARLAND. Very well.

Mr. HALE. Before that amendment is offered I wish to make one from the Committee on Appropriations, a correction of a misprint in line 23. At the end of the line the word should be "attendance," instead of "allowance."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The correction will be made, there being no objection.

The ACTING SECRETARY. In line 20 it is proposed to strike out "seventy-five thousand" and insert "fifty-two thousand five hundred," and in line 22 to strike out "thirty-two thousand five hundred" and insert "thirty thousand;" so as to read:

And to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay said awards the sum of $52,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated; and of this amount not more than $30,000 in all shall be certified and paid for medical services and attendance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to the amendment.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 14, noes 21; no quorum voting.

Mr. ALLISON called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think if all will vote there is a quorum.

Several SENATORS. We had better have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not like to vote to fix a definite sum to be paid because I do not know how much these parties are entitled to. If I had my way with this whole subject and had the authority, I would devolve the duty on the late Secretary of State and the late Secretary of the Treasury who were members of the political household of the late President; I would authorize them to ascertain, determine, and pay all claims connected with the sickness and death of the late President, and I would place at their command a sum of money sufficient to meet those expenses, whatever they might be. I think that would have been a very proper thing to have done. They were members of the political household of the President and around him all this time. I would not have let the family be troubled with anything of the kind; but to the late Secretary of the Treasury and the late Secretary of State I would have given ample authority to have ascertained and determined what was proper and due, and devolved on them the responsibility of paying what claims were proper. I do not like to say that $30,000 is enough; I do not know whether it is enough or not, and I do not want to give $52,500 because I do not know but what that is too much. We are left here in the dark in reference to the whole matter. If I had my way with this whole question, I would remit it to some responsible parties who were at that time connected with the President, and under their charge appropriate money to pay proper bills.

Mr. BLAIR. It seems to me that we are pursuing a very peculiar course in this matter. These physicians rendered their services to a private individual, and the estate of that individual is responsible to them legally, and no other party whatever is. From that private individual they would be entitled to precisely the same compensation that they would be entitled to receive from any other private individual. Some of these physicians, from their eminence, from the reputation which they have in the country, are able to command from seventy-five to one hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand dollars a year for their services. They would have a legal right to pursue the estate of President Garfield for a sum proportionate. Having that legal right, the Government of the United States, feeling that it would be humiliated by permitting this compensation to be taken from that private estate when the deceased died in their service, propose to tender to these physicians a limited sum of money beyond which they as an aggregate shall not go, with no knowledge whatever previously obtained as to the nature of the services, the value of the services, the extent or the real amount which they could in law and before a jury collect of that private estate.

Now, it does seem to me that the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware is the most honorable suggestion which has been made, to place at the disposition of some tribunal a sum of money which that tribunal may use in the appropriate and honorable payment and discharge of these claims; not to say to these physicians, "Here, you shall take so much, and shall not have your legal right as against the estate." Who is to compel them to release the estate at all? We are dealing with this as a matter of business, and we are exhibiting a disposition to higgle about it altogether too much, it seems to me, when, after they have received their money, we claim that we have done an honorable thing in assuming a legal liability and relieving the private estate of the individual concerned.

The report of the House committee showed that some of those physicians receive $1,000 per day for their services in some instances; and the amount that has been allowed to Dr. Bliss is only $15,000 for the entire service rendered, and the evidence they say before them was that Dr. Agnew and Dr. Hamilton during the entire continuance of this sickness gave at least one-half of their time. It does seem to me that we had better do precisely as the committee propose, and not amend it at all. The sum which the committee propose is niggardly enough, and there ought to be something to come and go upon, something to leave to the discretion of the tribunal that is to apportion whatever we give as between the different parties.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] which will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. The proposed amendment is to add to the amendment of the committee:

And provided further, That no claim shall be considered under this section unless the person filing the same shall file a release, under seal, of all claims against the representatives of the late President growing out of said illness and burial.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. In line 9 a verbal correction is needed. The word "and" should be "an," so as to read, "and shall make an award."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That verbal correction will be made. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND.]

Mr. HALE. Let that be read so that the Senate will understand it.

The ACTING SECRETARY. After the word "claims," in line 4, it is proposed to strike out "and the determination of all allowances," and after the word "examine," in line 7, strike out the remainder of the section, and insert:

All of said claims and proposed allowances and take the testimony in each, and certify the same, with all papers connected therewith, with their opinion as to the justice of each and all of such claims, to the President of the United States, to be by him laid before Congress at its next annual session.

Mr. HALE. That brings the matter right back to Congress again.

Mr. GARLAND. That is where I want it brought.

Mr. HALE. I hope it will not be adopted.

Mr. GARLAND. In line 7, after the word "hear," I propose to insert "and;" so as to read "hear and examine."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That correction will be made. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations as section 6, as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I have one or two matters from the Committee on Appropriations. On page 38, line 908 of section 1, I move to strike out "five hundred" and insert "one hundred and fifty-eight;" so as to read:

For pay of folders, $158.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 40, line 970 of section 1, "1881" should be inserted instead of "1882" as the date.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 63, after line 300 of section 2, I move to insert what was left out by mistake:

Fulfilling treaty with Flatheads and other confederated tribes, 1873 and prior years, to pay balance found due by the accounting officers to Charles S. Jones, late Indian agent, on settlement of his accounts, $719.32, as per letter of Secretary of the Treasury of June 22, 1882.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer an amendment, which I gave notice of and had referred to the Committee on Appropriations, to come in under the head of "Senate" at the end of line 993 of section 1:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay Charles N. Richards the difference between the pay of keeper of stationery and assistant keeper of stationery of the United States Senate for the period of time between the 1st day of May, 1880, and the 1st day of November, 1881, $454.10.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have another amendment, of which I also gave notice, to come in under the head of "tenth census," on page 32 of section 1, after line 755:

For one month's extra pay to the employés of the Census Bureau to whom certificates of service were issued after June 1, 1881, $66,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator explain the amendment?

Mr. ANTHONY. I have agreed, at the suggestion of the Senator who has the bill in charge, to reduce this one-half to half a month's pay, $30,000, and to add this proviso to it:

That in all cases the payment shall be made in person to the employé to whom such certificates were issued.

These clerks of the census, who are the poorest paid of any of the clerks in any of the Executive Departments, were kept out of their pay for five and a half months by the failure of Congress to make the appropriation. They were obliged to submit to such terms as the brokers imposed upon them, and many of them had to sacrifice 10 per cent. upon the face of their certificates. Since then they have been kept out of their pay for two months, and they are kept out now. I think it fair, since it was no fault of theirs, since if they had not gone on with their work great loss and expense would have been imposed on the Government, to give them this small allowance.

Mr. INGALLS. May we hear the amendment read again?

Mr. ANTHONY. Let it be read as I propose to amend it. I send it up in that form.

The ACTING SECRETARY. After line 755, on page 32, it is proposed to add:

For one-half month's extra pay to the employés of the Census Bureau to whom certificates of service were issued after June 1, 1881, $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That in all cases the payment shall be made in person to the employés to whom such certificates were issued.

Mr. HOAR. Does that mean that the person must come here to the Treasury?

Mr. COCKRELL. I make the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. I trust the Senator will not make the point of order. I offered this amendment and inquired of the Chair if it was necessary to go to another committee, and I was informed that it could go direct to the Committee on Appropriations. I trust that since I have reduced the allowance one-half, the Senate will give this little measure, not of generosity but of simple justice, to these poor hard-working clerks who are paid just enough to keep soul and body together, some of them only $60 a month; I think most of them only $60 a month; and who are kept out of their pay and who cannot live without it and are compelled to go to the brokers and sell their certificates for just what the brokers choose to give them.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator from Missouri will withdraw the point of order, for I apprehend it is well taken if insisted upon. I do not think there is any demand made upon this body more just than the one incorporated in the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island. I chance to know that a large number of employés, who could not be paid because of the failure of appropriations, as volunteers went on and performed the service, receiving certificates which they were compelled to sell at large discounts. If they had not so volunteered to proceed with the work, the work would have been delayed for months, involving a much larger cost as well as the inconvenience resulting from delay. Every consideration of justice demands that that loss that these employés sustained shall be made up to them, and I hope the Senator from Missouri will withdraw his point of order and allow the Senate to vote upon the amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. This amendment was pending before the committee and was voted down, and I suppose the persons in charge of the bill would insist on that action. I opposed the amendment in committee; but as I am not responsible for the administration of the Government now and for the appropriations that are being made by a Republican Congress, I withdraw the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Rhode Island.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. There is a deficiency, Mr. President, in the appropriation for the expenses of the District of Columbia for the past fiscal year amounting to about $165,000. This does not result from any extravagance on the part of the commissioners, nor from any unwarranted expenditures, but merely from the fact that in consequence of a construction that has been placed by the Comptroller of the Treasury upon a section of a statute previously passed in regard to the payment of taxes by what are known as drawback certificates, the income of the District has been reduced. In order that the expenses may be met I offer the following amendment, to come in after the word "nine," in line 1186 of section 1, after the amendment of the committee already agreed to at that point:

And the remainder of the unexpended balance in the Treasury to the credit of the District for the year 1881 is hereby made available for the expenses of the District for the year ending June 30, 1882: Provided, There shall be paid from the Treasury of the United States to the commissioners of the District, under section 2 of the act approved March 3, 1881, a sum equal to the amount of all general taxes paid in drawback certificates.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to reserve the point of order, if it will not interfere with my colleague presenting any argument to the Senate in favor of this matter, but I shall raise the point of order at the proper time and state the reason for it.

Mr. INGALLS. If the point of order is to be raised, of course it had better be decided now. I have no desire to make any explanation that will be idle and useless. It is very essential that the amendment should be adopted in order to carry on the District government without further deficiency; but I am aware that the amendment has not been reported from the District Committee, nor has it been sent to the Committee on Appropriations. I presume that it is amenable to the point of order; but inasmuch as it simply provides for the appropriation of an unexpended balance out of the Treasury, and for the construction of a statute that will give it what it is believed was the original intention of the Legislature, to wit, to give the District of Columbia credit for the entire amount of these drawback certificates, which were issued for excessive assessments, rather than to only allow them credit for 50 per cent. of them, it appears to me that it is just that the amendment should be allowed. Still if the point of order is to be raised, I do not wish to submit any argument or any figures on the subject.

Mr. HARRIS. I would suggest to the Senator from Kansas that if a full and clear statement of the exact facts of this case is made to the Senate, I am satisfied that neither his colleague nor any other member of the committee will make the point of order.

Mr. PLUMB. That is an entire mistake. I think I am as thoroughly advised on this point as I ever expect to be. It is one of those things which have come within my province as chairman of the sub-committee of the Committee on Appropriations, that had charge of the bill making appropriations for the expenses of the District of Columbia, and there I had occasion to consider it.

The committee adopted a provision which they deemed to be in exact accordance with the theory which now prevails in regard to the relationship of the General Government to the District of Columbia. They do not feel warranted in waiving that. They believe that was fully carried out in the bill as adopted. It was adopted by the entire committee, by the conference committee, by affirmative action on the part of the Senate, and I cannot, without violating what I conceive to be my duty as a member of the committee having this matter in charge, do otherwise than I have, raise the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. SAUNDERS. On page 19, after line 449, I move to add:

To pay John W. Dear for buildings included in the lines of Fort Robinson military reservation, $3,000.

This man Dear was a trader with the Indians near Fort Robinson, in the western part of Nebraska, some years ago, and in the course of time they wanted more land for the reservation of Fort Robinson, and they extended the boundary and included his buildings within it. That, of course, broke up his business, and he made a claim on the War Department for damages, and for his buildings, &c. I represented the case at the time; went with him, and they decided that he was not entitled to any damages, but that he would be entitled to something for his buildings, whatever they were worth. General Sheridan ordered a board to investigate the matter and appraise them, and the letter I send to the desk will tell exactly what was done.

Mr. ALLISON. I raise the point of order.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I hope the point of order will not be raised. Let the letter be read.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, July 3, 1882.

SIR: In response to your letter of this date concerning the appraised value of the buildings belonging to John W. Dear, which were included in the lines of Fort Robinson military reservation, I have to say that it appears that a board was appointed by Lieutenant-General Sheridan, under direction of the Secretary of War, of July 15, 1881, which board fixed the value of the buildings referred to at $3,000. The appraisal was approved by the Lieutenant-General.

Very respectfully,

ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
Secretary of War.

Hon. A. SAUNDERS, United States Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa withdraw the point of order?

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BECK. I desire to offer an amendment to come in after line 640, page 27:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to pay to the legal representatives of George C. Johnston the amount, not exceeding $10,510, which may be ascertained to be due to them under the provisions of an act of Congress approved March 3, 1843, entitled "An act for the relief of George C. Johnston."

I submitted the amendment on the 12th day of June and had it referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I will state the case. It is a very old case, and I know nothing about it except that some one has asked me to present the amendment.

Mr. HALE. I must reserve the point of order.

Mr. BECK. Certainly. Many years ago the Congress of the United States passed an act containing among other provisions this:

For an additional compensation to the Shawnee Indians for their reservation at the Wapaughkonitta, in Ohio, an annuity of $2,000 per annum, for fifteen years.

That was away back in 1832. In 1843 they passed another act for the relief of George C. Johnston, in these words:

That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized to pay to George C. Johnston the amount due and to become due to the Shawnee Indians under the act of Congress approved July 14, 1832, on account of a debt due from said Indians to said Johnston, and which the said Indians have ordered to be paid out of the annuity granted by said act: Provided, The sum paid pursuant to this act shall not exceed the sum due to said Johnston by said Indians exclusive of interest, to wit, $18,510.50.

The sub-committee did not understand what it was. I could not explain it, but at the request of the chairman I wrote to the Auditor, and here is his answer to me:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SECOND AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., July 1, 1882.

SIR: In reply to your request for a certificate that a balance of $10,510, said to be due to George C. Johnston, under an act for his relief approved March 3, 1843, (6 Stat., 901,) has not been paid, I have the honor to report as follows:

The act referred to authorized the Secretary of War to pay to George C. Johnston, from an annuity of $2,000 per annum for fifteen years granted to the Shawnee Indians by the act July 14, 1832, (4 Stat., 594,) a sum not exceeding $18,510 on account of a debt due from said Indians to said Johnston.

The records of this office show that the following payments have been made to Johnston: March 6, 1843, $500; May 4, 1843, $1,500; July 25, 1843, $2,000; April 10, 1845, $2,000; September 4, 1846, $2,000, making a total payment of $8,000, and leaving $10,510 still due.

No evidence has been found of any payments to Johnston other than the five herein specified.

Very respectfully,

O. FERRISS, Auditor.

Hon. JAMES B. BECK, United States Senate.

Here is the act of Congress requiring payment. The amendment I offered at first was to pay it to him, but when I came to examine it, it occurred to me that all that ought to be done, although there was a law requiring it to be paid, was to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to examine and see what amount, if any, was due to him, and to pay that and that only. He died a year or two after, in 1846. In 1870 we passed an act requiring all balances unpaid to be covered into the Treasury; and if there is nothing due it ought not to be paid, and if under this act of Congress there is any balance due to him it ought to be paid. Therefore I have moved the amendment in its present form.

Mr. COCKRELL. Suppose the fund has all been paid to the Indians?

Mr. BECK. That is provided for in my amendment and in the law; but they were to be paid in fifteen years, and the act of Congress was passed within ten years; so that if there was $10,000 due to them it could not have been paid before the act of Congress was passed giving it to him.

I told the committee when we were examining it that I would make the investigation. I will withdraw it and offer it to the sundry civil bill, or have it passed on now, just as the committee like.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator will withdraw the amendment. I must insist upon the point of order if he does not. If he will let it go to the sundry civil bill we can examine it more fully and see what has become of this fund.

Mr. BECK. Very well. I promised to make an examination and I have done so.

Mr. HOAR. Why should not the case go to the Committee on Claims?

Mr. BECK. If the Committee on Appropriations think it best, I will withdraw the amendment and reserve it for the sundry civil bill. I know nothing about it except what I have stated.

Mr. HALE. It is a very "old settler."

Mr. BECK. It is, but the Auditor's letter is reasonable; I will withdraw it for the other bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I offer an amendment to come in after line 449, on page 19:

To pay John H. Morgan as acting sergeant-at-arms of the committee of the Senate required to investigate the Cheyenne Indian raid of 1878, twenty days' service, $120.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I now offer an amendment which I sent to the Committee on Appropriations, to come in after the amendment that I have just offered:

For the payment to J. C. Hall, assignee of W. Goodman, president, for certain drafts in payment for mail transportation, returned and canceled in April and May, 1866, as allowed by the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury, $4,636.01.

Mr. HALE. I raise the point of order.

Mr. PLUMB. One moment till I make my statement. That is recommended in House of Representatives Executive Document No. 26, Forty-seventh Congress, first session, page 77, in the following language:

Allowed by the Sixth Auditor, under section 4, act of June 14, 1878:

Certificate No. 137. The Mississippi Central Railroad Company: For amount of Post-Office Department drafts in favor of W. Goodman, president of the Mississippi Central Railroad Company, dated August 17, 1861, in payment for mail transportation from April 1 to May 31, 1861, returned and canceled in April and May, 1866, $4,636.01.

I am advised that this is the amount which was found to be due to that railroad company as evidenced by the items of drafts drawn on postmasters in certain Southern States not paid in 1861, and therefore returned and canceled.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. McMILLAN. I offer the following amendment, to come in on page 41, after line 993:

To pay Henry Jones as messenger from April 20, 1879, to May 21, 1879, both inclusive, $126.50.

Mr. HALE. I make the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. McMILLAN. What is the point of order?

Mr. HALE. It increases the appropriation.

Mr. COKE. At the request of the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. JONAS,] who is unavoidably absent to-day, I call attention to an amendment heretofore submitted by him, and I ask that it be now acted on. The amendment has been before the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. After line 945, on page 39, it is proposed to insert:

To pay David L. Ward, being the difference between his salary as paid, $1,000 a year, and that of a Senate messenger, the duties of which position he performed, at $1,440 a year, from May 14, 1879, until May 31, 1881, $880.

Mr. HALE. I make the point of order.

Mr. COKE. It has been before the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HALE. And rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

BRITISH MINISTER AND CONGRESSIONAL DEBATERS.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

Whereas the Constitution of the United States, article 1, section 6, in relation to Senators and Representatives in Congress, provides that "For any speech or debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other place;" and

Whereas so sacred has this privilege been held in former times that John Randolph of Roanoke, then a Senator, would not allow Henry Clay, then Secretary of

State, to challenge him to fight a duel for language, however severe, spoken in the Senate, though quite willing to meet him on any other ground; and

Whereas Lionel S. Sackville West, the accredited minister of British monarchy in this city, on the 25th day of January, 1882, the day after Mr. ROBINSON, of New York, made his first speech on the imprisonment of American citizens in British jails, did, in violation of this constitutional privilege, call upon Mr. Frelinghuysen, our Secretary of State, and "questioned" Mr. ROBINSON'S remarks, delivering his judgment on Mr. ROBINSON. He also called the attention of the Secretary to the language used in debate and to the terms of the resolution offered by Mr. ORTH, of Indiana, by the unanimous vote of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and adopted by a unanimous vote of this House, "questioning" their propriety, and dictated to the Secretary of State, not only his disapprobation of Mr. ROBINSON'S remarks, but also his disapproval of the wording of the resolution of the committee; and

Whereas the said British minister, on the 8th day of April, 1882, inclosed to Lord Granville copies of the New York Tribune, containing its disapprobation of the law of 1868, and its unfavorable comments on the movement in favor of the release of our imprisoned citizens, which he indorsed as "satisfactory" to the friends of monarchy: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of State is hereby directed to inform this House, without reference to incompatibility with public interest, whether the said British minister suggested any punishment for those who had spoken in this debate of January 24, 1882, without his leave; whether he suggested the appointment of a British censor to revise, before publication in the RECORD, the speeches delivered in this House and the Senate; whether he suggested the person best fitted in this House to administer soothing sirup to the British lion when disturbed by any movement of the eagle's wings; whether he suggested the official recognition of the New York Tribune, "founded by Horace Greeley," a member of the "Irish Directory of 1848," as the British organ in the United States, in manifest injustice to the equal claims of the New York Times; and whether the said British minister suggested that as we had saluted the British flag at Yorktown he supposed we had permanently pulled down our own; together with the substance, as full as possible, of the conversation between the said minister and our said Secretary of State on said 25th day of January, 1882.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT TERRE HAUTE, INDIANA.

The SPEAKER. This being the first Monday of the month motions by individual members to suspend the rules are the regular order. The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. PEIRCE,] at the time of the adjournment on the first Monday of June, had pending a motion to suspend the rules, and which is the first now in order. The gentleman from Indiana moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. No. 62) which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. No. 62) to provide for the erection of a public building for the use of the post-office and Government offices at the city of Terre Haute, Indiana.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to purchase a site, and to cause to be erected, at the city of Terre Haute, in the State of Indiana, a suitable building for the use and accommodation of the post-office and other Government offices in said city, with fire-proof vaults extending to each story; the site, and the building thereon, when completed according to plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, not to exceed the cost of $150,000; and the sum of $75,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purchase of said site and the completion of said building: Provided, That there shall be an open space of not less than fifty feet upon every side of said building, including streets and alleys, and that no part of said sum shall be expended until a valid title to said site shall be vested in the United States, and the State of Indiana shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of any civil process therein.

Mr. McMILLIN. I call for a second, in order that the report may be read and some explanation made of this bill.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection, and the second was ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose the report will be read.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is there nothing to be said in favor of this bill? We should have some explanation of it.

Mr. PEIRCE. I ask the Clerk to read the two letters which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 30, 1882.

SIR: I am in receipt from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue of your letter of this date, and, as requested therein, have the honor to submit herewith a copy of a letter of February 15, 1881, from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to the Secretary of the Treasury regarding the necessity for a Government building at Terre Haute, Indiana.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. J. FOLGER, Secretary.

Hon. D. W. VOORHEES, United States Senate.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, February 15, 1881.

SIR: I have received a letter from Hon. D. W. VOORHEES, United States Senate, making inquiry in regard to the needs of the internal-revenue service at Terre Haute, Indiana, for a suitable public building for the transaction of business at that point.

In reply I will state that the collection district is composed of fifteen counties, and it would seem probable that the district would be maintained as long as the internal-revenue system of taxation is continued.

The collections of said district have been large for a number of years, and for the last fiscal year amounted to $1,531,283. Including the collector, there is a force of thirteen persons required in the office for the transaction of the public business. On the 1st of February of this year the collector was charged on the books of this office with $1,080,473 of internal-revenue stamps, and usually keeps that amount on hand.

The office is now located in an ordinary brick building, not intended to be fire-proof. While the stamps and other valuables are kept in a vault and safe in said office, the great bulk of the records and files of the office are in ordinary wooden file-cases, subject to be destroyed in the event of a fire.

The rent now paid for the use of said office is $900 per annum.

Terre Haute is a growing city of, say, 30,000 inhabitants. The post-office service must certainly require a very considerable amount of house room. If a post-office and an internal-revenue office could be combined in one fire-proof building of suitable size and planned and erected with an eye to economy, it would, in my opinion, be a judicious expenditure.

Very respectfully,

GREEN B. RAUM,
Commissioner.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, February 8, 1882.

SIR: In reply to your inquiries of the 7th instant, I have the honor to state that the records of this office show—

First. The amount of revenues collected in the seventh collection district of Indiana for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1881, was $2,253,760.27. For the six months ended December 31, 1881, it was $763,098.91.

Second. The average value of stamps kept on hand by the collector is $1,000,000.

Third. The amount paid for rent of the collector's office per annum in Terre Haute is $600.

Respectfully,

GREEN B. RAUM,
Commissioner.

Hon. R. B. F. PEIRCE, House of Representatives.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 8, 1882.

SIR: In reply to your letter of yesterday, I would say:

Gross receipts for 1881, (Terre Haute,) $33,415.62.
Postmaster's salary, $3,000.
Allowance for clerks, $6,100.
Allowance for rent, $900.
Allowance for fuel, $108.
Allowance for light, $495.
The lease of the present quarters does not expire till December 15, 1887.

Very respectfully,

FRANK HATTON,
First Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. R. B. F. PEIRCE, House of Representatives.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman rise to oppose the passage of the bill?

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I do. I rise to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PEIRCE] some questions in regard to the merits of his bill. While it is a most ungracious and thankless task to oppose the passage of any bill for the erection of a public building anywhere in the United States, and while in my judgment no opposition to the erection of any public building anywhere will be of any avail, yet, nevertheless, I do wish that the House should understand the merits of this case.

And in saying what I propose to say I beg that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PEIRCE] will not consider that it is from any feeling personal to him, but it is simply the discharge of what I conceive to be a public duty, and an attempt to arrest what seems to me to be a wasteful expenditure of the public money.

In the first place, public buildings have been authorized by this House for various reasons. At some places they are authorized on account of population, and we are told that the business of the United States Government at the particular locality has nothing to do with the question; that whether they have courts or not is of no consequence; that whether there is a post-office there or not is of no consequence. It is a mere question of population, and if the population there is large then a public building should be erected. Under that plea the bill goes through.

Another case is presented, (and there have been several cases of that kind,) where the population is but three or four thousand, and a public building has been authorized at the place and we have been told that population has nothing to do with it; that the question is whether the United States has any business at the place, and if it has business then a public building should be erected there.

The reason for constructing this building, I understand, is based on the population. There is no United States court at Terre Haute, either district or circuit; but it has a population by the last census of 26,042. Because of this population at that place we are asked to erect a public building there.

The business of the United States at Terre Haute is the collection of internal revenue and the carrying on of a post-office. The letter just read, upon which the argument is based for the erection of a public building at this place, is directed to the great amount of revenue there collected.

Now, it is well understood that a sentiment is gaining ground in this country which will soon become so strong that it will lead to wiping out the whole system of internal revenue. Hence it seems to me that we ought not to base an argument for the erection of a public building at Terre Haute upon the fact that to-day a large amount of internal revenue is being collected at that place, because, as I have just stated, the system of internal revenue may at a very early day be entirely destroyed. Therefore the only argument in favor of the erection of this building is that they have there a population of 26,000, and they also have a post-office. Now what is the rent paid by the United States Government for the post-office at Terre Haute? The Government pays an annual rental of $900 for a post-office at Terre Haute.

I have simply laid these facts before the House. I have not the slightest feeling about this matter, and I have not the slightest expectation that the bill will be defeated; but I do submit that this proposition has not the least particle of merit in it and ought not to be approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendments joint resolutions of the House of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 216) authorizing the Secretary of War to supply artillery and camp equipage to the encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic at Bismarck Grove, in Douglas County, Kansas; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 247) to provide for the printing of public documents, for binding and distribution to those entitled to receive them.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill and joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 6244) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 243) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriations to pay the fees of witnesses in the United States courts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. No. 1960) authorizing the New Orleans and Northeastern Railroad to construct bridges over the channels of Pearl River and Lake Pontchartrain; and

A bill (S. No. 2090) to further regulate the investment of the Pacific Railroad sinking fund.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON. I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PEIRCE] to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. PEIRCE. I will do so.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which has just been returned to the House by the Senate with amendments. My object in doing so is to move to non-concur in the Senate amendments, so that the bill may be got into conference as early as possible.

Mr. HOLMAN. Some of these amendments, I think, should be considered in Committee of the Whole, unless it is considered that this motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is not a merely formal motion. If it is a merely formal motion then I must insist upon the consideration of the Senate amendments in Committee of the Whole. If my friend from Illinois intends his motion as a real expression of the opinion of the House against the amendments of the Senate, then of course I will not object.

Mr. CANNON. While perhaps some of the amendments of the Senate ought to be concurred in, I am satisfied that the great majority of them ought not to be. But the gentleman will have his remedy when the report of the committee of conference is made. I make this motion now merely to expedite the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. This matter is subject to a point of order I believe?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly, if the gentleman desires to make the point.

Mr. ATKINS. I suggest that if the gentleman from Indiana objects to the motion, we had better not undertake to consider the amendments now, but let them go to the committee.

Mr. CANNON. I think the gentleman from Indiana will be safe in consenting to the motion to non-concur.

Mr. HOLMAN. These amendments embrace some increases of offices——

Mr. CANNON. I am aware of that.

Mr. HOLMAN. If upon the subject of increases of salaries and offices this motion to non-concur is to be understood as a bona fide motion, and the House is to be regarded as opposed to such legislation upon this bill, then I am content that the gentleman's motion should be adopted. But if the gentleman intends to yield those points, I object.

Mr. CANNON. I suppose when this matter goes to a conference it will be a free conference. Of course when the conference report comes in it will be subject to ratification or rejection by the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. When the report comes in I presume it will pass nem. con., as is generally the case with conference reports.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. The bill is still subject to a point of order, I believe.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman insist on his point of order? The Chair does not understand that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PEIRCE] gave way for the purpose of going into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CANNON. He did not.

The SPEAKER. Is the point of order insisted upon?

Mr. HOLMAN. With the understanding that this is a bona fide vote and that the House is opposed to the amendments increasing offices and salaries, I have no objection.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee that reported this bill, I do not think the gentleman in charge of it or anybody else can make any pledges as to what shall be done about the bill in conference.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly not.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman from Indiana had better make his point now or waive it altogether.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am not asking any pledge at all. I am well satisfied that the House shall non-concur in these amendments. All I ask is that it be understood the House by this vote expresses its opposition to increasing offices and salaries on this bill.

Mr. O'NEILL. I wish to say a word to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. CANNON,] who has made this motion. I had hoped his motion would be that the amendments be printed and lie over for consideration, so that we could have an opportunity to examine them before they are acted upon. I am very sure that I, as a member of the sub-committee of the Committee on Appropriations upon this bill, would approve many of the amendments of the Senate, as I did not entirely approve the bill either in the sub-committee or in the Committee on Appropriations itself. I am very sure that upon many of these amendments my views would coincide with those of the Senate. I believe that by some of these amendments the bill is greatly improved. Hence, I would like to have an opportunity to vote in favor of some of them. Differing as I did from members of the sub-committee, I wish the gentleman would move only that the amendments be printed and not urge action at present upon concurrence or non-concurrence.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to non-concur in the amendments of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were non-concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. I now ask that the bill with the Senate amendments, numbered, be printed.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection that order will be made.

There was no objection.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT TERRE HAUTE, INDIANA.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PEIRCE] to suspend the rules and pass the bill for the erection of a public building at Terre Haute.

Mr. PEIRCE. Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] intended to make any misrepresentation of the reasons which we give for the erection of this public building at Terre Haute. He stated, however, that the only reason we have to offer is that we have a post-office there. I wish to say to the gentleman and to the House that in addition to the post-office we have an office for the collection of internal revenue. The letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, indorsed by the clerk, shows that the revenue collected at Terre Haute for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, was $2,253,760.27; and for the purpose of collecting this revenue a large corps of officers must be supplied with an office for the transaction of business. The letter further states that the average amount of internal-revenue stamps kept on hand by the collector at that place is a million of dollars. So that the gentleman did not state the circumstances correctly when he said that the fact of a post-office being located at Terre Haute was the only reason given for the erection of this public building. At Terre Haute is transacted the business of one of the largest collection districts of the West.

Terre Haute, instead of having only 26,000 population, as stated by the gentleman from Michigan, has over 30,000. It is one of the most rapidly growing cities of the West. Being the center of a rich section of the country, it has large railroad and manufacturing interests. Large sums of money have been invested in permanent improvements and various kinds of business enterprises. Among the prominent business institutions of the city I mention the following: two blast furnaces; nail works; distillery, second only in capacity to distilleries of the world; large car works; five large flouring mills; many large stores, factories, and cooper-shops; hominy mills; hub and spoke factories; the Vandalia railroad shops, employing over a thousand men.

Terre Haute is situated upon the following railroads: Terre Haute and Indianapolis, 73 miles in length; Terre Haute and Logansport, 115 miles; Evansville, Terre Haute and Chicago, 192 miles; Saint Louis, Vandalia and Terre Haute, 183 miles; Indianapolis and Saint Louis, 256 miles; Terre Haute and Cincinnati, 40 miles; Evansville and Crawfordsville, 109 miles; Illinois Midland, 147 miles.

The Government has no building of its own in which to transact its large internal-revenue and postal business, and in view of these facts it does seem to me that this House should pass this bill to erect such a building as this immense business demands.

The gentleman makes the point that there is no Federal court at Terre Haute. I will say to him that in consequence of the great increase of business there is a pressing demand for a Federal court there, and one must soon be established. A very large portion of the business now transacted at Indianapolis comes from our section of the State, and our people suffer great inconvenience in not having a United States court more convenient.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I understood the gentleman to state that the population of Terre Haute is over 30,000, and that I was in error in stating the population as reported by the last census to be 26,042.

Mr. PEIRCE. That was the population by the last census.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Then I was not in error in making that statement.

Mr. PEIRCE. But the gentleman said the present population is 26,000.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I stated the population by the last census.

Mr. PEIRCE. But during the last year four hundred new dwellings have been erected in that city.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. But the gentleman misunderstood me. I did not state 26,000 as the present population but as the population by the last census.

Mr. PEIRCE. I consent that the gentleman may stand corrected.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. The gentleman will allow me one further remark. He says I alleged the only reason for asking a public building at Terre Haute was the fact of there being a post-office there. I stated distinctly that one reason urged by those who advocate this measure is that at present a large amount of internal-revenue is collected there; but I said that as internal-revenue taxation is to be rapidly reduced a public building should not be erected for any such reason as that.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask my colleague whether he does not think $100,000, the sum reported by the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, would be an adequate and ample appropriation for this purpose?

Mr. PEIRCE. I do not. I think it should be $150,000 as it is in the bill. There is an effort now being made for the establishment of a Federal court there. Owing to increase of business in that part of the State it is found to be necessary, and Terre Haute and other counties have been urging bills for the establishment of a United States court. In the very nature of things, as I have said, there is a necessity now, and the necessity will be growing stronger all the time, for the establishment of a Federal court at Terre Haute. If we are to have a public building, then, let us have a public building that will answer for all purposes, and not put up a part now and after we have established a court have no place for its accommodation.

Mr. HOLMAN. Federal courts are now held at four different places in Indiana. Terre Haute is an enterprising little city, but there is no necessity for Federal courts at that place. All the accommodation now required is for a post-office. The incidental matter of internal revenue is hardly to be taken into account, for we know that is temporary, and the system will likely come to an end before this building is erected. Does not my colleague think, therefore, that for the accommodation of a post-office in the city of Terre Haute an appropriation of $100,000 is sufficient?

Mr. PEIRCE. For a post-office merely that would be sufficient, but then we have to take into consideration the necessary accommodation for the collection of the revenues.

Mr. HOLMAN. But the collection of the internal revenues is merely a temporary matter and requires no permanent building. I cannot, consistent with views of reasonable economy, vote for more than the committee reports, $100,000.

Mr. PEIRCE. It is a very large business there. The Senate committee did unanimously report in favor of the amount named in the bill—$150,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. There are other districts where the internal-revenue business is much larger, and where no public building is asked to be constructed. My own district pays over $3,000,000 internal revenue annually.

Mr. PEIRCE. Does not the gentleman know that none of the Federal courts now established in Indiana are convenient to the citizens of Western Indiana?

Mr. HOLMAN. That is true as to Western Indiana, and also true as to Southeastern Indiana. I do not agree with my colleague that there is any public reason for increasing the number of Federal courts in Indiana. On the contrary, I think two of them should be discontinued.

Mr. PEIRCE. I do not care to discuss further the necessity of a court at Terre Haute, because there may be a diversity of opinion upon its necessity; but I do insist that a public building there is necessary for the present postal and revenue business. Indiana is not receiving her share of appropriations for public purposes, and I regret to see the gentleman antagonizing her interests in this way.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to this bill, especially for the purpose of directing attention to the system of legislation, in my judgment vicious, which has grown up here during this session of Congress in regard to the construction of public buildings. We have already built public buildings in many places, or authorized them to be constructed, where there is not any real necessity for them, and where the trade, travel, and commerce are hardly sufficient to keep the pennyroyal and dogfennel tramped down in the streets. As my friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] has stated, we go on authorizing a public building at this place for post-office accommodation and at another place for the accommodation of internal-revenue offices.

In this particular case of Terre Haute the gentleman from Michigan has stated the amount of rent paid for the post-office is $900 a year. This bill provides for the expenditure of $150,000 for the construction of a public building, or rather it appropriates now $75,000 and authorizes the construction of a public building to cost $150,000.

The gentleman from Indiana has said there are large internal revenues collected in that district. In the district from which I come we have collected, I doubt not, as much internal revenue as is collected in the Terre Haute district. For the last ten or twelve years a building has been rented for the officers. I presume the rent has not been exceeding $1,000 a year.

I have no particular animosity toward this district, and regret I have to oppose the bill. But I must remember and this House should not forget that there are interests of fifty millions of people to be considered in connection with all these measures. A recklessness in reference to authorizing the construction of public buildings has characterized this Congress never before seen since the organization of the Government.

Mr. DE MOTTE. How much more has been appropriated by this Congress than by former Congresses?

Mr. McMILLIN. Ten times as much for public buildings, I suppose.

Mr. DE MOTTE. By this Congress more than by the forty-sixth Congress?

Mr. McMILLIN. Certainly.

Mr. DE MOTTE. I think the gentleman is all wrong.

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not remember the exact figures, but I think there have been more public buildings authorized to be constructed during this session than for the same time during any previous session of Congress. What I had reference to when I said "ten times as much by this Congress as by the Forty-sixth" was that there had probably been that many more public buildings authorized, and not ten times as much money spent.

Mr. DE MOTTE. I do not want to see the gentleman go wrong.

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not wish to be wrong, and I think the statement I have made is entirely right. I thank the gentleman for his paternal care, and will be glad to receive any suggestion from his superior wisdom.

Mr. DE MOTTE. My superior wisdom amounts to little, but I happen to have seen the figures, and I say now to this House this Congress has not appropriated as much as the last Congress for public buildings.

Mr. McMILLIN. Yes; but you must remember this Congress has not yet gone through one session, and that there are many bills yet to be acted on which the committee have reported favorably. You have from thirty to forty new public buildings recommended, and no doubt they will have the same favorable action the preceding ones have had. When you take into consideration the fact that we have to go through another session of Congress, my statement will be found within limits. To compare this one session of Congress with the preceding three sessions of Congress is not a fair contrast. My friend from Indiana [Mr. DE MOTTE] must remember that our Republican brethren on his side of the House left us a legacy of indebtedness on buildings commenced which had to be completed by us when we got control of the House.

Mr. DE MOTTE. Possibly. I also remember that we left you other legacies—legacies of principle—of which I fear you have not been so careful.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. By permission of the gentleman from Tennessee, I desire to say that the amounts appropriated for public buildings during the last three Congresses was to a very large extent due to the buildings authorized to be constructed by the previous Republican Congresses. They were unfortunate legacies or rather incumbrances left by the Republican party. Notably the expensive buildings for post-offices, &c., at St. Louis, Chicago, New York, and other cities. It became necessary for the last three Congresses to appropriate millions in order to continue the works already commenced.

Mr. DE MOTTE. Many of the appropriations made for public buildings have been made to carry on works begun by the Forty-sixth Congress.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. You ought not to have left us such legacies. You ought to have appropriated enough to finish them and not left such burdens for us to carry.

Mr. McMILLIN. I wish to say in the statement I have made I referred to the works which originated in the preceding Congress. If we make a contrast between the number of works authorized in the preceding Congress and the number already authorized during this Congress, and yet to be acted upon by the House, we will see that in the statement I have made I am strictly correct. I do not undertake to say that we have already appropriated more money for such purposes than was appropriated in the last Congress during the whole of its sessions, and taking into consideration what had to be continued from former Congresses; but in matters which have originated in the present Congress, and bills which have been passed and reported favorably for the erection of public buildings, I do undertake to say that it has never been surpassed in extravagance in that direction by any Congress in the history of this Government.

Mr. DE MOTTE. And I have examined and am prepared to deny that it compares unfavorably with other Congresses in that respect.

Mr. McMILLIN. To return to the propriety of building, the interest on the cost of this building will be $4,500 a year even at 3 per cent. The rent paid there at present by the Government for the post-office is only $900; and so far as the internal-revenue taxes are concerned, it seems, judging from the tone of this Congress and the sentiment prevailing in the country, that system is not to be continued forever. There is little need for appropriating a large sum of money for constructing a public building to provide offices for its collection. I hope, Mr. Speaker, this Congress will call a halt at last in the matter of these appropriations, and that some little economy in this respect will prevail. I do not expect to defeat this bill. I have not seen one of them defeated during this Congress. I hope it can be defeated, although, to speak candidly, I do not believe it will be; yet I want to enter my protest against this reckless system of legislating and against the extravagance which has characterized this Congress, and against the course we seem to be determined to continue, notwithstanding all protest to the contrary.

Mr. PEELLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to favor the motion——

The SPEAKER. The time allowed for debate has expired. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I desire to ask whether all the time in opposition to the bill has expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I hope the gentleman will accept the House bill providing for an expenditure of $100,000 for this purpose.

The SPEAKER. Further debate is not in order. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Indiana to suspend the rules and pass the bill which has been read.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 83, noes 42.

Mr. McMILLIN and Mr. BRAGG. No quorum.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan demands the yeas and nays. As many as are in favor——

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I wish to inquire whether a quorum has voted?

The SPEAKER. The Chair was submitting the question on the demand of the gentleman from Michigan for the yeas and nays on the last vote.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I wish to inquire before that if a quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan now, as the Chair understands, makes the point that a quorum has not voted.

Mr. BRAGG. I made the point of order that no quorum had voted immediately on the announcement of the vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman as now making the point, but the yeas and nays have been demanded.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Was there a two-thirds vote in favor of this motion, as announced by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. There was a two-thirds vote.

Mr. BRAGG. I made the point of order that there was no quorum before the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. McMILLIN. I also made the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 119, nays 54, not voting 117; as follows:

PUBLIC BUILDING AT OXFORD.

Mr. MANNING. I move that the rules be suspended, that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4179) for the erection of a public building at Oxford, Mississippi, and that the same be passed.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the United States courts, post-office, and other Government offices, at the city of Oxford, in the State of Mississippi. The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed for the site and building complete the sum of $50,000: Provided, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than forty feet, including streets and alleys; and no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Mississippi shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owners thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection a second will be considered as ordered.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I object.

The SPEAKER. A second having been demanded, the Chair under the rule will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. MANNING, and the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. BURROWS.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 108, noes 9.

So (further count not being called for) the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] is recognized to control the time in opposition.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. When this matter was called to the attention of the House recently I took occasion to make some statements with reference to the population and the necessity, or the want of necessity, for a public building at the place named in this bill. I desire now to reiterate what I said then, with some modification. I was in error as to the amount paid for rent for the use of United States courts, and in justice to the gentleman from Mississippi I desire to say that the amount paid is somewhere in the neighborhood of $500 a year for the rent of buildings for the United States court. There is no internal-revenue collector at that place, so that argument, I suppose, will not be used in this case. The rent paid for the post-office is paid by the postmaster, and the gross receipts of the post-office at this place are in the neighborhood of $2,400. The population by the last census——

Mr. MANNING. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANNING. I did not hear what the gentleman said as to the rent paid for the court-house.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I made the necessary correction of my former statement. It is in the neighborhood of $600 or $700.

Mr. MANNING. I have a letter from Jonathan Tarbell, of the office of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, dated the 7th of June, the day following the issue joined formerly between the gentleman from Michigan and myself, and he states that the amount paid is $730.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. There has been some reduction since that, I understand. But we will not differ as to that. The amount is in the neighborhood of $700. There has been no collection of internal revenue and no rent paid for internal-revenue offices. And there is no rent paid for the post-office except such as is paid by the postmaster; the gross receipts of the post-office being in the neighborhood of $2,400.

Mr. FISHER. I would ask the gentleman what right has the Government to pay any rental in a place like that where the gross receipts are but $2,400?

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. They do not pay it, and they ought not to pay it.

The population in 1880 of the city of Oxford was 1,534. The population in 1870 was 1,422. There was an increase in ten years of one hundred and twelve people.

In view of the vote just taken for the Terre Haute building, I suppose this bill will pass. I have no argument to make. I simply state the facts. There is one reason for the passage of this bill, I will say frankly, which did not exist in the last case. There is a United States court here. There was not any at Terre Haute.

I have not the slightest idea this bill ought to pass. And yet we have just passed one for $150,000 at a place where there is not a court, and this provides $50,000 for a building at a place where there is a court. I make these statements to put myself right, and at the same time reassert what I said before, that I think the bill ought not to pass.

Mr. MANNING. I am very much indebted to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BURROWS;] he is almost ready to support this bill. I do not want any comparison instituted between this bill and other bills that are not now under consideration. I voted for the bill which was just passed, a bill not so meritorious as this one, in my opinion, but a proper bill to pass under the circumstances.

Mr. WILSON. Have you a United States court at your place?

Mr. MANNING. I will remark that the United States court has been held at Oxford and vicinity for more than half a century. The clerk writes to me (and I have his letter upon my desk) that the cases brought during his long term of service have averaged one hundred and forty-four annually. The judge writes an earnest letter, addressed to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, which I dare say largely influenced that committee in making their favorable report of this bill to the House.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] tells us that the town of Oxford is small. I have heard that suggested with reference to other bills, but I have failed to appreciate the objection.

The only matter which this House should consider in connection with that point is the population of the district, the number of people within the jurisdictional limits of the court. What matters it if there are no people there, if process runs a great distance and can reach a large number of people?

In this district there are twenty-two large counties, averaging nearly five hundred square miles each, and aggregating about eleven thousand square miles, a larger extent of territory than any one of seven States in this country which could be named. In the twenty-two counties of this district reside between three and four hundred thousand people, more than the population of any one of six different States of this Union. In addition to that, we have in the district taxable property that foots up over $40,000,000. Now, all this property, all this population, all these square miles are subject to the jurisdiction of the court held at Oxford.

Need I add anything to this? Will it be disputed that where there is a court held there should be comfortable provision made for the judge and the different officials, and adequate protection given to the records of that court? What business man would expose his valuable papers as the Government of the United States exposes the papers of the United States courts, where they have no vault or anything more than a board box in which to put those papers? The papers in the office of the clerk of the district court for the northern district of Mississippi are confided to the custody of the clerk, who has nothing but a plain board box to keep them in.

My friend from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] suggests to me that every county in every State in this country has seen proper to erect a court-house. In this case the United States court is sandwiched between the State court, the chancery court, and the circuit courts of that State.

I do not intend to speak more than a moment longer; but I want to say something for the benefit of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MCMILLIN,] who I hope will not antagonize this bill. It is in reference to a statement which he made when the last bill was under consideration. I desire to read from a statement made by Mr. MORRILL, of the Senate, a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and who always takes pains to ascertain the merits of the bills submitted to his committee. He says:

> The idea that this Congress has appropriated an extravagant sum for public buildings at the present session is entirely baseless. There have been a larger number of bills for buildings reported favorably, but the gross amount does not exceed the amount that was appropriated in the Forty-fifth or at the Forty-sixth Congress. Up to Monday—

These remarks were made by Senator MORRILL on the 7th of June:

> Up to Monday there had been but $460,000 of money absolutely appropriated by Congress. The whole sum of the bills that have been passed by the House and Senate amount, when the buildings shall have been completed, to the sum of $3,400,000, and the amount appropriated this year will be a little over $2,000,000. The amount appropriated in the Forty-fifth Congress was $6,466,067; in the Forty-sixth Congress, $6,268,923; so that it will be seen that unless the next session of Congress shall appropriate a larger sum than has been appropriated at this session, the amount that will be appropriated for the Forty-seventh Congress will be about the same as in the Forty-fifth or the Forty-sixth.
> I may also add another fact in the matter that was contributed by a member of the House, Mr. WILLIS, who has taken pains to ascertain the amount of rentals paid throughout the country, and he finds the fact that if we were to capitalize the amount of buildings we propose to put up, in both Houses, the rentals now paid would exceed 4 per cent. on the whole amount.

I have here a report made in the Forty-fourth Congress from the Committee on Expenditures on the Public Buildings, from which I read a single paragraph:

> The total amount annually expended for rented premises in all the departments exceeds one and a quarter millions of dollars; a sum equivalent to 4 per cent. interest on more than $31,000,000. This amount, judiciously expended, would construct several hundred handsome public buildings; enough to supply the needs of the public service for half a century to come, and put one in every important city in the Union not already supplied.

I ask in this bill for only $50,000, for the erection of a plain, substantial, secure building that will give comfortable provision for the officers and those in attendance on the court, and provide proper security for the records of that court. That amount is all that I have ever asked for, and I believe that at the time I introduced this bill it was the smallest amount that any gentleman had seen proper to ask for.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I desire to say only one word in reply to what the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MANNING] has said, and also upon the same point made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] when the other bill was before the House. It is to the point that we have not appropriated as much in this Congress as was appropriated by the last Congress for this same purpose.

Now, in no sense is the erection of public buildings a party question. I regret exceedingly that the question should have been raised as to how much was appropriated for this purpose in the last Congress and in the preceding Congresses, and that a comparison should have been drawn between the Democratic party and the Republican party in making appropriations for public buildings. It has nothing to do with the question. I have not touched upon it, and shall not do so. This question is purely a matter of business.

Mr. MANNING. I did not believe that it had anything to do with the question; but gentlemen who oppose the bill had seen proper to speak of it.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I understand.

Mr. MANNING. And it has been frequently adverted to in former discussions.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I do not criticise the gentleman for what he has said. I simply say this ought to be a business transaction, passed upon by business men. If as a matter of business it appears proper that a public building should be erected at Oxford, Mississippi, then let it be erected; but if not, let it be voted down. I wish that every bill coming before this House for the construction of a public building could be passed upon upon its merits and upon business principles, just as we would consider the construction of a building upon our own premises. I regret to believe that these bills for the erection of public buildings go through by the votes of gentlemen who have had buildings authorized in their districts, or who desire them; and these two influences combined are too strong for successful resistance.

Mr. MANNING. The gentleman will hardly insist that he is now speaking to the merits of this case.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Well, I think it has a bearing on the case. It bears on the point I am making, that in passing any bill of this character we should be governed by business principles solely.

Mr. MANNING. One fact which I omitted to mention a minute ago is that the records of this office are kept by the clerk in a separate room, far removed from the room in which the court is held.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I have nothing further to add upon this question. The House is in possession of the facts.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word in favor of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be heard in the time of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MANNING.]

Mr. MANNING. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I desire to say that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have considered this as purely a business question. We quite agree with the gentleman from Michigan. It ought not to be regarded as a political question.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I did not fully approve of the bill which just passed, making an appropriation of $150,000 for a public building at Terre Haute, Indiana, because our committee, after careful consideration, believed that an appropriation of $100,000 would be quite ample for that place and consistent with the general policy of the House committee to reduce the ultimate cost of these buildings. In almost every instance we have reported a less amount than the Senate. Otherwise I favored the bill. The bill we are now considering asks for $50,000 to construct a court-house at a central point for over 300,000 people and twenty-two counties. The Government of the United States is bound to provide accommodations for transacting public business with decency and dignity and in a safe, convenient, and economical manner. Conceding the fact that the United States has before its circuit and district courts in the State of Mississippi public business in which twenty-two counties are interested, and a central point like Oxford where the business must be transacted and the records kept, and where the convenience of the court and of parties interested and the safety of valuable papers and records must be provided for, this becomes purely a business question. We do not hesitate to say that the State of Mississippi, which, until within a few years, has been unwilling to cede jurisdiction to the United States over one foot of territory, but is now willing and anxious to make such cession, should have within its borders just such buildings, owned and occupied by the Government, in which to uphold the dignity of judicial procedure among those people. This measure as a business proposition should become a law. Hence, I favor it. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. MANNING to suspend the rules and pass the bill, it was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

DUTY ON WOOLEN GOODS.

Mr. KELLEY. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to correct an error in section 2504 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the paragraph beginning with the words "clothing, ready-made, and wearing-apparel," under Schedule M of section 25 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, be, and the same is hereby, amended by the insertion of the word "wool" before the word "silk" in two places where it was omitted in the revision of the said statutes; so that the same shall read as follows:

"Clothing, ready-made, and wearing-apparel of every description, of whatever material composed, except wool, silk, and linen, made up or manufactured wholly or in part by the tailor, seamstress, or manufacturer, not otherwise provided for, caps, gloves, leggins, mitts, socks, stockings, wove shirts and drawers, and all similar articles made on frames, of whatever material composed, except wool, silk, and linen, worn by men, women, or children, and not otherwise provided for, articles worn by men, women, or children, of whatever material composed, except wool, silk, and linen, made up, or made wholly or in part by hand, not otherwise provided for: 35 per cent. ad valorem."

Mr. BRAGG. I make a point of order on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRAGG. This House, after deliberate discussion, decided that it did not know enough to revise the tariff so as to reduce it; and in accordance with that judgment rendered against ourselves, I make the point that the House is not competent to increase duties if it is not competent to reduce them.

The SPEAKER. That is not a point of order.

Mr. MORRISON. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to considering the motion to suspend the rules seconded.

Mr. MILLS. I object.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas insist on a vote on it?

Mr. MILLS. I do. I wish to have a second.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints Mr. KELLEY and Mr. MORRISON as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 107, noes 2.

Mr. MILLS. I hope this side will let them get a quorum by themselves.

The SPEAKER. Members are requested to vote, as no quorum has voted.

The House further divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 136; noes 10.

So there was a second.

Mr. MILLS. One hundred and forty-six is not a quorum; 147 are required for a quorum.

The SPEAKER. One hundred and forty-six is a majority of 291. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Illinois to control the time in opposition.

Mr. MORRISON. Some weeks ago this bill was rejected by the House. Then it was offered, as it now is, under a suspension of the rules to shut out amendments and to prevent the correction of other abuses and hardships of the tariff, especially to prevent any modification or reduction of the high rates of duty which come down to us from the war, and which were adopted professedly as war measures for purposes of revenue. This is in violation of the positive assurance long since made by the majority of the Ways and Means Committee through the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] that an opportunity would be given for a vote on a modification of war duties.

Under existing tariff laws, as interpreted by the courts, imported hosiery and knit goods made on frames pay a duty of 35 per cent. Should this bill pass it will so increase the duty on these goods that they will pay, none of them, except the finest goods, less than 85 per cent., and some of them as high as 100 per cent. When this question was considered a few weeks ago its advocates insisted that justice demanded this change from the lower to the higher rate, because it was alleged the lower rate of 35 per cent. was the result of an error or mistake made in the revision of the statutes, by which the law was changed, not revised. I had not then examined for myself whether or not there had been such error or mistake by the revisers of the statutes, and was ready to accept as true the statements of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] and others who assumed to know the facts. I conceded that though the court had not so decided it was probably true that an omission or error of revision had been made, since it was true that some other similar goods were taxed at a higher rate than 35 per cent. Since then I have carefully examined the subject, and I do not believe any such error of revision was made; on the contrary, I find that the revisers left the law as they found it and did not change it, as asserted.

This controversy is older than the revision of the Statutes. I have here a copy of protests made to then Collector Arthur at New York, September 8, 1873, protesting against the collection of the higher rate, "because said merchandise, being gloves, wristlets, and similar articles made on frames not otherwise provided for, is only liable to duty, under the twenty-second section of tariff act of March 2, 1861, and the twentieth section of the tariff act of July 14, 1862, at the rate of 35 per cent. ad valorem." This was long after the act of 1867, which it is insisted changed the duties on these knit goods—such as miners' caps, socks, and men's underwear—to the high rate of 85 to 100 per cent. This controversy began soon after the law of 1867 was passed, and Messrs. Heyl, Morgan, and Ogden, the acknowledged government experts at New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, in their several books on tariffs and tariff rates, have from then until now, before and since the revision of the statutes, stated the rates of duty on knit goods "made on frames" to be 35 per cent. ad valorem.

That the higher duty was demanded and collected until the court decided it to be illegal resulted, it is said, from the action of the appraiser, who is required to report facts on each invoice and who reported to the collector "knit goods, value 80 cents per pound," and did not report the other fact "made on frames," a controlling fact in fixing the rate of duty. It may be that in 1867, when the woolen manufacturers met here and made a tariff for themselves which Congress enacted into a law—as it has enacted into a law every demand made by protectionists for twenty years last past—and when they put a duty of 85 to 100 per cent. on knit goods, "except such as are composed in part of wool not otherwise provided for," they did not intend to except these knit goods made on frames composed in part of wool and which were otherwise provided for. If such was the intention, this is an instance in which greed did not get all it intended to take.

When the wool duties were fixed in 1867, they were made higher to compensate for internal income taxes and taxes on manufactures; 10 per cent. or more of the duty then imposed was to compensate for these taxes. These internal taxes were long since removed, but the gentlemen who are here to-day demanding that the duty on knit goods shall be increased to the rate they insist was intended by the law of 1867 do not propose to abate anything for the internal taxes taken off, yet they assume to demand this legislation in the name of justice. They will not do that justice which for fifteen years they have denied.

The claim made that these knit goods should pay the higher rate of duty because of the high duty on wool is even less meritorious than the other specious reasons urged in support of this measure. These goods are largely made of cotton, and shoddy, and when the tariff was made it was known they would be made largely of such material. Now gentlemen are insisting upon this tariff on knit goods being made so high as to compensate for all-wool goods made of imported wool paying a high rate of duty. The duties on wool are claimed to be higher than the duties on the woolen goods.

From statements presented here by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. BUCK,] taken from the census, the fact appears there are but fourteen cents' worth of wool in every dollar's worth of woolen knit goods. Less than $4,000,000 buy all the wool in more than $28,000,000 of knit goods.

Mr. BUCK. And is not that over 5 per cent. on all the product?

Mr. MORRISON. If the wool used was all imported and duty paid on it, the duty would be but 5 per cent., or five cents on every dollar's worth of knit goods made; but the fact is that this official census statement shows that less than 6 per cent. of the wool used in this knit-goods industry is imported and that the duty paid on the wool used to make goods valued at $1 is less than one cent. Except when it suits them, the advocates of this measure do not admit that tariff adds to the cost of goods not imported. For sake of the argument, and for the sake of truth as well, we will admit them to our side now, since now they admit tariff on goods for the use of manufacturers does increase their cost. When we have admitted what in argument is apparently claimed, that the tariff increases both the imported and domestic wool to the extent of the duty on what is imported, yet 5 per cent. will compensate for all the wool used, which is, as I have said, but fourteen cents of value in each $1 in value of goods made.

We are again met with the old, old story, which we meet as often as somebody wants higher duties that he may gather from the people more bounty on his products. This bill, it is said, will give employment and good wages to the laboring poor. The honorable gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] told us, when discussing this bill, more than 100,000 persons were engaged in this industry, which were in great danger of loss of employment if this bill failed to pass. The facts presented by the gentleman from Connecticut show that the gentleman from Iowa overstated three or four times the number engaged in this industry, and he is equally at fault in asserting that this bill will affect the wages or employment of a single person.

Mr. COX, of New York. And they do not get the protection either.

Mr. MORRISON. No, by no means. They get in this industry $230 for the year, seventy-seven cents per day, (three hundred days to the year,) while $490 of capital earns $230. A fair business profit on $490 of capital would be $49. Protection in knit goods increases this $49, which is capital's rightful share of earnings, to $230. How much of the $230, which each laborer receives for a year's work, shall I credit to protection? Deduct the wages paid and cost of materials used in making knit goods, and it leaves $7,118,952 for the year to $15,133,991 of capital invested, which is 47 per cent. for capital. To continue this condition of things in the name of labor is to mock labor.

Mr. BUCK. But the gentleman from Illinois will remember that there are 28,000 persons employed in this industry, and that it supports a population of about 100,000 people. That was the statement that was made in reference to it.

Mr. MORRISON. More than 100,000 engaged was the statement. There are no doubt about five in population to one employed, where persons employed are heads of families. If 28,000 heads of family were employed, it would represent an average of about five to each, or 140,000 persons; but that is not this case, for only about 7,000 of these are heads of families; the rest are women and children. Three thousand of them are called youths, and seven thousand only are men who have families. Seventeen thousand of them are females over fifteen years of age. It is not for these laborers, or any of them, this legislation is asked—it is for capital.

I believe I have said all I desire to state in connection with this matter, and will yield the remainder of the time to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE.]

Mr. CARLISLE. Mr. Speaker, the report submitted by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, accompanying this bill, states that its purpose is to correct an error in the Revised Statutes. Now, sir, so far as the time allotted to me will permit, I shall undertake to show that for a period of at least forty years continuously there has been a clear distinction made in the tariff laws of the United States between knit goods made on frames and other knit goods and wearing apparel. I shall show by a reference to the laws enacted prior to December 1, 1873, and in force at that date, that there was no mistake or omission in the revision, so far as it relates to this subject, and that there is therefore no such justification as the report alleges for this irregular and sudden attempt to increase the duties on the clothing of the people. The province of the commission was to revise and codify the existing laws, and not to make new ones, and in this particular instance, at least, that duty was faithfully performed.

In the tariff act of 1842 it was provided that—

> On woolen and worsted mitts, gloves, caps and bindings, and on woolen and worsted hosiery, that is to say, stockings, socks, drawers, shirts, and all other similar manufactures made on frames, a duty of 30 per cent. ad valorem.

On all other wearing apparel a duty of 50 per cent. ad valorem was imposed by that law. By the act of 1846 the classification and duty were left unchanged; and in the act of 1857 the same distinction between knit goods made on frames and other knit goods and wearing apparel was preserved, but the duty was reduced on this description of goods from 30 per cent. to 24 per cent. ad valorem. The law so remained until the passage of the act of March 2, 1861, which reimposed the duty of 30 per cent. ad valorem, but expressly retained the classification and description of knit goods "made on frames" as separate and distinct from other kinds. The language of that act is:

> Caps, gloves, mitts, socks, stockings, wove shirts and drawers, and all similar articles made on frames, of whatever material composed, worn by men, women, or children, and not otherwise provided for.

It is not claimed that the act of July 14, 1862, made any change in the law, and consequently it is unnecessary to quote its provisions on this subject. It merely increased the duties and left the classifications and descriptions as they stood before. We come now to the debatable ground—the act of June 30, 1864—which the report of the committee says repealed the act of 1861 so far as it related to hosiery composed of silk, linen, or wool, or of which those materials should be component parts. While all the gentlemen who advocate the passage of this bill insist that the act of 1861 had been repealed before the revision of 1873–'74, they have not been able to agree among themselves as to the time when the supposed repeal was made. The committee and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BUCK] claim to find the repeal not only in the act of 1864 but also in the act of March 2, 1867, while other gentlemen, equally as well advised, find it in only one of those acts, but do not agree with each other as to the particular one. Here is the act of 1864, and the clause relied upon by gentlemen reads as follows:

> On shirts, drawers, and hosiery of wool, or of which wool shall be a component material, not otherwise provided for, 20 cents per pound; and in addition thereto 30 per cent. ad valorem.

I call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that the operation of this clause of the act of 1864 is by its express terms confined to those classes of woolen goods "not otherwise provided for," and that this class of knit goods, this particular description of woolen hosiery, was otherwise provided for by the act of 1861 and therefore could not have been embraced in the clause just read by any rule of construction known to the law. There is not a word in this clause inconsistent with the act of 1861, and even if the words "not otherwise provided for" were not contained in it there would have been no repeal. The former act contained a specific designation and description of the articles embraced by it, that is, "caps, gloves, mitts, socks, stockings, wove shirts and drawers," &c., "made on frames," while the terms of the latter act were general and could not rationally be so construed as to alter the duties imposed upon the specifically designated and enumerated articles.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in not less than a dozen well-considered decisions, has uniformly held that when goods subject to duties under the customs laws are particularly classified and described in one statute and duties prescribed accordingly, that classification is not changed and those duties are not repealed or altered by the general language of a subsequent statute, although that language might ordinarily be broad enough to embrace them. This rule was expressly reaffirmed in the decision which has created the occasion for the introduction of the bill now under consideration. In that decision the court said:

> It is also well settled that when Congress has designated an article by its specific name and imposed a duty on it by such name, general terms in a later act or other parts of the same act, although sufficiently broad to comprehend such article, are not applicable to it. (Movius vs. Arthur, 95 U. S., 144; Arthur vs. Leary, 96 U. S., 112.)

I have shown that hosiery and knit goods made on frames have been known and designated in our tariff laws as a separate and distinct class of articles ever since 1842, and it is clear, therefore, that they would not be affected by any subsequent statute which did not mention them by that special designation and description. In the case of De Forest vs. Lawrence, 13 Howard, 274, the Supreme Court said:

> When Congress, in legislating on the subject of duties, has described an article so as to identify it by a given designation for revenue purposes, and this has been so long continued as to impress on it a particular designation as an article of import, then it must be treated as a distinct article, whether there be evidence that it is so known in commerce or not. It must be taken as thus known in the sense of the revenue laws, by reason of the legal designation given to it, and by which it has been known and practiced on at the custom-house.

This rule has never been departed from by the court in a single case, and if it is to be repudiated now by Congress it will not be because the rule itself is wrong, but merely for the purpose of affording a pretext for a large increase of duties upon necessary articles of wearing apparel in common use among the laboring people of the country. Bearing these decisions in mind, let us turn now to the latest act upon the subject before the revision, the act of March 2, 1867, which is quoted in the report of the committee and is inserted word for word in the Revised Statutes. So far as it relates to the question now under consideration, it is as follows:

> Flannels, blankets, hats of wool, knit goods, balmorals, woolen and worsted yarns, and all manufactures of every description composed wholly or in part of worsted, the hair of the alpaca, goat, or other like animals, except such as are composed in part of wool, not otherwise provided for, valued at not exceeding 40 cents per pound, 20 cents per pound; valued at above 40 cents per pound and not exceeding 60 cents per pound, 30 cents per pound; valued at above 60 cents per pound and not exceeding 80 cents per pound, 40 cents per pound; valued at above 80 cents per pound, 50 cents per pound; and in addition thereto, upon all the above-named articles, 35 per cent. ad valorem.

Here, again, we find not only that general terms were used which, according to the uniform current of decisions, could not alter or repeal existing specific provisions, but we find also that by the express language of the act it was intended to apply only to flannels, blankets, hats of wool, knit goods, &c., "not otherwise provided for." What woolen knit goods, except those "made on frames," were otherwise provided for at the time the act of 1867 was passed? No gentleman has even attempted to show why the words "not otherwise provided for" were embraced in the act if they were not intended to exclude from that classification hosiery and knit goods made on frames. Sir, the claim set up in the report and in the speeches of gentlemen here on the floor, that the act of 1861, so far as it related to woolen hosiery made on frames, was repealed either by the act of 1864 or the act of 1867, is wholly without foundation. It is as baseless as the other assertion that if this bill is not passed all the establishments engaged in the manufacture of this class of goods will be forced to close and throw their laborers out of employment.

The act of 1861, as modified, not repealed, by the act of 1864, was in full force when the revision of the statutes was made, and if the commission had undertaken to except woolen goods from the provision in Schedule M, they would have been changing the law instead of merely revising it. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] has just called the attention of the House to the fact that the recognized Treasury experts, Messrs. Ogden, Morgan, and Heyl, in all their annual publications upon the tariff laws and rates of duty from 1864 down to the present time have concurred in holding that the goods affected by this bill were dutiable at 35 per cent. ad valorem, and were not subject to the double specific and ad valorem duties which are now sought to be imposed upon them. I have their books here on my desk, but it is not necessary to read from them, as nobody will question the accuracy of the gentleman's statement. They are standard authorities in the custom-house, and are supplied annually to all the principal officers engaged in the collection of import duties. Even if there were room for a reasonable doubt as to the proper construction of the various statutes upon this subject, the concurrent opinions of these three recognized authorities ought to turn the scale in favor of the lower rate of duty, and inspire the members of this House, for once at least, with a determination not to sacrifice the interests of the consumer and the Government to the unjust demands of protected capital.

Stripped of its artificial surroundings, this is a simple proposition to more than double the tariff tax upon a large class of necessary articles worn by the men, women, and children in all parts of the country, and the only way to treat it fairly is to consider it as a measure to increase the profits of protected capital and diminish the rewards of unprotected labor. Within a week this House, by a very considerable majority, has passed a bill to relieve banks and bankers from an annual tax of more than $9,500,000 upon their capital and deposits and to relieve depositors in banks from a tax of $2,500,000 on checks. This was done upon the plea that we were collecting too much money from the people, and yet every attempt to extend the measure of relief by reducing or repealing other taxes which really affected the great body of the people was promptly voted down by the advocates of that bill. Having relieved the banks and bankers, who are neither more nor less meritorious than those engaged in other pursuits, upon the avowed ground that they were being taxed too much, the advocates of the present bill, in order to be logical and consistent, ought to urge its passage upon the ground that the people are not being taxed enough. But whatever may be the real motives of gentlemen upon the other side, the important fact to be borne in mind is that the legislation repealing taxes on capital is now to be supplemented by legislation increasing taxes on labor. The bill passed last week repealed taxes and reduced the revenue; this one will increase taxes without adding a dollar to the receipts of the Government, and consequently the people will bear a heavier burden, while the Treasury will receive no corresponding benefit.

During the present session of Congress a law has been enacted creating a tariff commission to make certain investigations with a view "to the establishment of a judicious tariff, or a revision of the existing tariff, upon a scale of justice to all interests;" and now, sir, before that extraordinary body has even commenced its labors we are asked to suspend all the rules of the House and pass, without opportunity to offer amendments, a bill changing the tariff laws in a most important particular. When we protested against the delegation of our powers to a commission to be appointed by the President, we were invariably told that Congress was not competent to deal with so great and complicated a subject as the tariff; that the representatives of the people could not be safely trusted to legislate on a matter of such vital importance without advice and assistance from an executive commission, and especially that it would be unwise and dangerous to attempt to make changes in the tariff laws without the most careful consideration of the entire subject in all its parts. Legislation by "piecemeal," as it was styled, was especially deplored as the greatest evil that could possibly overtake the industries of the country. Upon these grounds, urged here day after day for more than a month, the tariff-commission bill was passed, and those of us who did not indorse either the character or purpose of the measure had no alternative but to submit and wait with such patience as we could command for the vindication of our position. That vindication has come earlier than we expected. Before the commission had been appointed, almost before the two hundred applicants for places on it could transmit their names to the President, appeals began to reach Congress for relief from the inequalities and hardships of the tariff, and in every instance these appeals came from the very interests which had denied the competency of Congress and demanded the commission. The millions of consumers, who at last pay all the duties, with interest and profits added, knew very well that the creation of the commission was fatal to all their hopes for early relief, and they have kept silent.

The demand for immediate legislation comes now from another source, from the protected classes, from the gentlemen who want higher duties and larger profits at the expense of the people, who are compelled by law to pay whatever they choose to ask or do without the necessaries and comforts of life. If the tariff commission is still supposed to be competent to perform the work it was professedly appointed for, if it is competent to make such recommendations as will result in a revision of the tariff on a scale of "justice to all interests," why this hot haste to comply with the demands of the manufacturers of hosiery and knit goods? If the people at large can wait, as they must wait, for justice at the hands of the commission, why cannot the manufacturers and the advocates of the commission wait also? If this Congress is the representative of all the people, and not merely the representative of a part of them, it will treat them all alike, and will either disregard the commission act entirely and proceed to make a thorough revision of the tariff in the interest of the whole country or compel the manufacturer as well as the consumer to wait for relief from its hardships.

This legislation is all on one side. When the consumer asks for a reduction of duties upon his clothing and the tools and implements of his trade, the doors of the committee-rooms and the House are slammed in his face, and he is told to carry his complaint to the commission, but when the man to whom he pays tribute demands the privilege of increasing his exactions, all the rules which govern ordinary legislation and afford opportunity for ample debate, amendments, and deliberation in the enactment of laws must be summarily suspended upon a mere motion, and nothing can be done, not even a second motion to adjourn can be made, until the demand is fully complied with. A few more such illustrations of the great Republican doctrine of "equality before the law" will certainly be sufficient to satisfy all reasonable men that it is nothing more than an empty sound, a seductive phrase to tickle the ears of the unwary voter while greed rifles his pockets.

On its face this bill appears to be a very simple and harmless measure; but a very little examination will be sufficient to show how unjustly and injuriously it proposes to affect the consumers of woolen hosiery and knit goods. Under the statutes already referred to, and under the decision of the Supreme Court in a case involving this identical question, the legal rate of duty on these articles is now 35 per cent. ad valorem. Now it is proposed, by simply inserting the word "wool" in two places in the Revised Statutes, to so increase the duties that they will be not less than 85, and may be over 100, per cent. ad valorem, except upon the finest and most costly quality of the goods. These excessive duties have been imposed for many years in violation of law, but since the court has declared what the law really is, the Secretary of the Treasury has issued instructions to refund the money to the importers. The consumers, however, who in fact not only paid all these excessive duties when they purchased the imported goods, but also paid millions of dollars in addition on account of the increased price of the domestic product, will get no relief under the Secretary's order or otherwise. Nothing can be refunded to them. What has been the effect of these high duties illegally imposed by the customs officers? The official reports show that on some grades of the goods they were almost absolutely prohibitory, the revenue received by the Government amounting to only a few dollars per annum. For instance, in the year 1880 the whole revenue derived from one grade of these goods was only $9.65, and from another only $39.39, the rates of duty on them being 96½ and 92 per cent. respectively. In 1881 the whole amount collected on one grade was $24.15, and on another $19.86, the rates of duty being 89½ and 88½ per cent. respectively. On the finest and most costly grade much larger amounts were collected in each of the years named, because, as is generally the case under our tariff system, the ad valorem rate of duty was much less on the fine goods than on the coarser and cheaper goods. If the law is permitted to remain as the court has declared it, that is, with a 35 per cent. duty on all grades and qualities of woolen hosiery and knit goods, the Government will hereafter derive a large revenue from that source, the consumers will not be taxed half as much as this bill proposes to tax them, and the domestic manufacturer will be amply protected against any disadvantages under which he is supposed to labor in the production of these articles.

According to the last census report the total capital invested in the manufacture of these goods in 1880 was $15,133,991, and the value of the product was $28,613,727. The whole cost of labor was $6,530,576, and the whole cost of material used in the manufacture was $14,954,199, making a total of $21,484,775 for labor and materials. The excess of the value of the product over the total cost of labor and material was $7,128,952, or 47 per cent. on the whole amount of capital invested. If this capital of $15,133,991 had been loaned at 6 per cent., which is about twice as much as the farmers of the country receive annually on their investments, it would have yielded an income of $908,039.46; but being invested in the manufacture of hosiery and knit goods, and being protected at the expense of the consumers by high rates of duty, it in fact yielded, as already stated, $7,128,952, or nearly eight times as much as the usual legal rate of interest on money.

The owners of this capital, the recipients of this enormous income, actually have the courage to look the Representatives of the people in the face and declare that unless this bill passes they will be compelled to close their establishments and deprive their laborers of employment! I entertain no unkind feeling toward the gentlemen themselves or the business in which they are engaged, and would not purposely prevent them from receiving a fair and reasonable profit upon their investments; but, sir, in view of the facts disclosed by the official statistics, it is a severe trial to one's patience to listen calmly to such declarations as these. What did they pay to their laborers during the year when their own income was 47 per cent. upon their capital? The same report shows—and it is their own report made to the special agent of the Census Bureau—that they paid for labor less than 23 per cent. upon the value of the product, while, without the increase proposed by this bill, they will still be protected to the extent of 35 per cent.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] has already stated that the average daily wages of the laborers employed in these establishments was only 77 cents. In fact it was only 74 cents per day, if we reckon six working days for each week in the year; and in some localities it was much less even than that.

At Cincinnati there were 321 hands employed, and the total wages paid amounted to $55,425, being $172.70 per year, or $3.32 per week, which is only 55¼ cents per day.

At Chicago the number of hands was 525, and the wages paid amounted to $66,966, being $127.17 for the year, or $2.45 per week, which was 41 cents per day.

At Detroit the number of hands was 198 and the wages $21,960, which was an average of $110.90 to each hand for the year; that is $2.13 per week, or 35½ cents per day.

These are the average amounts paid for labor. Of course some employés received more and many received even less than these amounts. How any human being can live in a city on such wages and provide such food, clothing, and shelter as an American laborer ought to have is beyond my comprehension. It will, I think, require all the ingenuity of gentlemen on the other side to convince these laborers that they have received any large measure of protection, or benefit in any way, from the high rates of duty illegally imposed upon this class of goods during the last fifteen or twenty years.

But the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BUCK] and others appeal to us to suspend the rules and pass this bill on the ground that the duty imposed by law on imported wool is higher than the existing rate on hosiery and knit goods, and we are told that by reason of this fact there is an actual discrimination against the domestic manufacturers. There would be more force in this appeal if gentlemen were able to show that these articles are in fact manufactured from imported wool. Let us see what the actual facts are as shown by their own returns to the census agent for the year 1880. The whole cost of material used was $14,964,199, but only $3,821,183, or about 25 per cent. of this sum, was paid for wool of all kinds, foreign and domestic. Only 448,758 pounds of foreign wool were used during the year, which is less than 5¼ per cent. of the whole quantity consumed.

According to the gentleman from Connecticut this foreign wool belonged to what is known as raw or unmanfactured wool of the first class, and is subject to a duty of 12 cents per pound and 10 per cent. ad valorem, which in the year 1880 was equivalent to 41.61 per cent. ad valorem. The reports from the Bureau of Statistics show that the average cost of this class of imported wool during the whole of that year was less that 37¼ cents per pound. The 448,758 pounds of imported wool, therefore, cost $168,284.25, upon which the duty, at 41.61 per cent. ad valorem, amounted to $70,023. This is not quite one-fourth of 1 per cent. upon the value of their annual product. Now, sir, we are gravely asked to believe that a duty of 35 per cent. upon their product will not compensate them for a duty upon the imported wool used by them amounting to less than one-fourth of 1 per cent. upon the same sum. This is too large a draft upon our credulity, and gentlemen must excuse us if we refuse to honor it.

Mr. Speaker, the decisions of the Supreme Court declaring the legal rate of duty to be thirty-five per cent. ad valorem under the statutes, was pronounced on the 14th day of March, 1881, more than fifteen months ago, as appears by the records of that tribunal, and consequently if it be true, as stated, that the manufacturers have accumulated a large stock of goods, it is clear that they have been made since the law was correctly expounded. The suit itself was commenced in March, 1876, and from that time to this there has been notice to everybody concerned that the interpretation given to the revenue laws by the Treasury Department, was disputed, and that a judicial settlement of the question had been involved. Under these circumstances, there is no more occasion for immediate legislation in this particular case than there has been for years in hundreds of other cases under the tariff laws.

If the manufacturers of these goods are injured or oppressed by the law as it now exists, they have a perfect right to seek redress at the hands of the same tribunal which their Representatives have provided for all the other citizens of the United States, and they should be required to go there. Or, if the commission is to be ignored at the demand of one class or interest, it should be ignored for the benefit of others, and we should proceed in the regular and ordinary way to grant relief to all the victims of this unjust legislation. We should have no favorites here. Every consideration of justice and duty demands that we should listen as kindly and respond as promptly to the appeals of the people who labor themselves as to the appeals of the people who live and grow rich upon the labor of others. Associated capital is generally capable of taking good care of its own interests, while labor is generally dependent and powerless.

Our tariff laws can be so revised and amended as to do justice to all interests—to the Government, to capital, and to labor; but this desirable end will never be accomplished unless we repudiate all such partial legislation as is proposed in this bill and determine to deal with the question fairly and impartially. Revenue for the Government with incidental protection for labor, but no bounty for capital, is the policy demanded by the intelligence and patriotism of the country, and the time has now come when it ought to be inaugurated.

Mr. KELLEY. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON.]

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. When this subject was up before the House on a former occasion I voted against the bill. I think I was wrong, and the maniiest thing a man can do when he thinks he is wrong is to get over to the right side as quickly as possible.

The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MORRISON,] in the course of his remarks said that only about twenty-eight thousand people would be turned out of employment.

Mr. MORRISON. I did not say that; I did not say anything like that.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Then I withdraw the statement; I do not mean to misrepresent the gentleman. I understood him to say that the number affected by this was represented to be 100,000, when it was only 28,000. However that may be, if only 1,000, or if only 500 American workmen or American working girls are affected here, that is sufficient to make us pause and not inflict an injury on that class.

I believe a mistake has been made in the law, which ought to be corrected. And I believe that a large number of people are to be injuriously affected by the continuance of the law as it is. It is not an argument to me that when we have created a commission for reforming the tariff we will hold a bad law in existence so as to bring them up to the mark and make them act on the subject of revising the tariff. I believe if girls instead of men, as the gentleman from Illinois has stated, are to be affected, that is a strong argument, because these girls are working for the support of their mothers and sisters; and that is a strong argument with me why this thing should be corrected.

One single word more—it is all I have time to say. As this law stands it is against the interests of the American workman. It is only for the benefit and the upbuilding of foreign competition against our own labor; and I am for American labor against all parts of the world.

Mr. KELLEY. I yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. HASKELL.]

Mr. HASKELL. It is utterly impossible for me in five minutes to answer the attack that has been made on the position taken by the committee that the present revision of the statute was in violation of the law, and a clear and palpable error. It is enough for me to say, admitting all that my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] has said as to what the law used to be in 1842, in 1861, and in 1864, it is enough for me to say that in 1867 this law, quoted by the gentleman from Kentucky, referring to flannels, blankets, hats of wool, and knit goods, was enacted, and that by the provisions of that law all other provisions concerning knit woolen goods were repealed by direct terms. For it says this provision shall be in lieu of the tariff heretofore collected upon these articles.

But further than that, Mr. Speaker, I desire to show to this House that two Secretaries of the Treasury have decided that this was an error—Mr. WINDOM and Mr. Folger.

Mr. BUCK. And Mr. Boutwell.

Mr. HASKELL. Gentlemen on my left say Mr. Boutwell and Mr. SHERMAN, also. Then four Secretaries of the Treasury have decided it was an error. Mr. MORRILL, the author of the old tariff of 1861, says it was an error. I am informed the man who wrote out in the Revised Statutes the words you now see there claims himself it is an error.

In the circuit court of the United States in the State of New York, in the case of Vietor against C. A. Arthur, collector of the port of New York, it was held that the old act of 1867, before the revision, gave the duties that we desire to give by this bill, the decision of that court in the State of New York showing it was an error. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided, in language as near as it possibly could upon a question not immediately before it, that it was an error; that is the language of it.

Mr. MORRISON. It decided the duty was 35 cents.

Mr. HASKELL. But the Supreme Court says that if it was called to pass upon the act of 1867 instead of upon the section of the Revised Statutes, its decision might be different; and that is all the Supreme Court ever does say in such cases.

Mr. CARLISLE. But the Supreme Court did not consider that question.

Mr. HASKELL. Of course it did not; but it says that if it had considered it it gives you clear intimation that it would have decided it to be an error.

And more than that comes that great overwhelming argument in favor of the proposition that it was an error: if it was not an error, then a number of protection committees, a lot of men in favor of the protection of home industry, actually went to work and framed a law that will tax the American manufacturer 20 per cent. for the privilege of manufacturing goods in America. Why, sir, a free-trader would not do that, and it is absurd to charge that. Here was a protection Congress planting itself upon its desire to protect American industry. Now, unless this is an error, such a Congress as that imposed a tax of 20 per cent. upon American manufacturers for the privilege of making goods in America.

There has never come a proposition before the Committee on Ways and Means that appeals so strongly to my sense of justice and equity as this bill. There are appealing to us 28,000 people, and $30,000,000 of productions about to be stricken down, who are asking for life at the hands of a Congress sworn to protect them.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KELLEY. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. PEELLE.]

Mr. PEELLE. When this bill was up before I gave it my support, and I shall do so again. The Committee of Ways and Means, through its chairman, [Mr. KELLEY,] uses this language in reporting this bill to the House:

The purpose of the first section of this bill is to correct an error made in revising the Statutes, which error is found in a paragraph near the bottom of page 474 of the Revised Statutes, edition of 1878. This paragraph is found in Schedule M, called sundries, of the tariff law. Schedule L provides for all duties on wool and woolen goods, and is a re-enactment and embodiment of the statute of March 2, 1867, which repealed all former duties on wools and woolen goods, and imposed pound duties on wools, and corresponding pound duties on woolen goods; the object being to set off one pound duty against the other, and, in addition, 35 per cent. on the manufactured article. The revision on page 471 is the act of March 2, 1867, word for word, which imposed duties in lieu of all former duties on wools and woolen goods. This statute provides as follows:

"Flannels, blankets, hats of wool, knit goods, balmorals, woolen and worsted yarns, and all manufactures of every description composed wholly or in part of worsted, the hair of the alpaca, goat, or other like animals, except such as are composed in part of wool, not otherwise provided for, valued at not exceeding 40 cents per pound, 20 cents per pound; valued at above 40 cents per pound, and not exceeding 60 cents per pound, 30 cents per pound; valued at above 60 cents per pound, and not exceeding 80 cents per pound, 40 cents per pound; valued at above 80 cents per pound, 50 cents per pound; and, in addition thereto, upon all the above named articles, 35 per cent. ad valorem."

The duties above prescribed were made to correspond with the value of the goods, and the higher-priced woolen goods were made to pay a duty of 50 cents per pound. These rates were collected prior to and since the revision of the statutes down to the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Vietor and others against C. A. Arthur, collector of the port of New York, rendered about fifteen months ago.

The paragraph in which the error occurs is found in Schedule L of the tariff laws, and reads as follows:

"Clothing, ready made, and wearing apparel of every description, of whatever material composed, except wool, silk, and linen, made up or manufactured wholly or in part by the tailor, seamstress, or manufacturer, not otherwise provided for; caps, gloves, leggins, mitts, socks, stockings, wove shirts and drawers, and all similar articles made on frames, of whatever material composed, except silk and linen, worn by men, women, or children, and not otherwise provided for, articles worn by men, women, or children, of whatever material composed, except silk and linen, made up or made wholly or in part by hand, not otherwise provided for: 35 per cent. ad valorem."

It will be noticed that the word "wool" is found in the first exception of the above paragraph, but is omitted from the other two exceptions included in the same paragraph, and it is plain that the three exceptions were intended to exclude all articles of wearing apparel made of wool, silk, or linen from the rate of duty levied by the paragraph. The clause which causes the hardship on American manufactures of knit goods is found in the paragraph of Schedule M, above quoted, and reads as follows:

"Caps, gloves, leggins, mitts, socks, stockings, wove shirts and drawers, and all similar articles made on frames, of whatever material composed," &c.

There was no exception of wool, silk, or linen in the original paragraph, because the law had not yet been passed that excepted them; but by the act of June 30, 1864, a special provision was made for these articles on pages 208, 209, 210, volume 13, Statutes at Large. By the act of June 30, 1864, wool, silk, and linen goods were excepted, and this paragraph applied to cotton goods alone, and should have been placed in the revision in the cotton Schedule A. The revisers recognized the fact as to silk and linen, and begun right with wool in the first exception, but neglected it in the second and third exceptions. The act of March 2, 1867, page 561, volume 14, Statutes at Large, provides for all manufactures of woolen goods.

Until that decision of the Supreme Court the Treasury Department construed the law to be precisely what it will be if this bill shall become a law. I am not prepared to say whether the duty imposed by the ruling of the Treasury Department was too high or not, but certain it is that if this bill shall become a law it will not operate to take it out of the jurisdiction of the commission which this Congress has created for the purpose of revising the tariff, and I am willing that that commission shall correct whatever abuses there may be in the rate of duty imposed upon this and all other articles, but here we find what the committee report to be a manifest error in the revision of the law by the omission of the word wool, and the first section of the bill under consideration seeks to correct that error by amending section 2504 of the Revised Statutes of 1878.

I believe the correction of this error to be in the interest of the wool-growers of this country, and in my State they ask that this error be corrected.

Believing, as I do, from a careful examination of the report made by the committee, that this was an error in the revision of the law, and that great hardships would result to the business interests of the country if not corrected, I think it but just to that interest and the large number of laboring-men employed that Congress should correct the error. In voting for this bill I simply vote to conform the law to what has been the uniform practice of the Treasury Department. These are the reasons which impel me to support this bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KELLEY. I now yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. BRIGGS.]

The SPEAKER. How much time?

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to reserve time enough to give the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HUBBELL] one minute.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I hope this bill will receive the favorable consideration of this House. Its defeat, or the failure to pass it, will strike down a new and important industry now carried on in nineteen States of this Union. In New Hampshire it is one of great importance. The census reports for 1880 show that in that State there are twenty-four establishments engaged in this industry; the capital invested therein is $1,224,000; the number of operatives employed, 1,753; the amount of wages paid annually, $536,117. They consume 76,000 pounds of foreign and 1,680,333 pounds of domestic wool. The value of materials consumed, including wool, is $1,249,600, and he value of the manufactured product is $2,362,779. But these statistics from the Census Bureau giving the number of people employed do not give us and the country full information.

These statistics simply embrace the operatives employed in the mills. There are but few of these establishments which complete the product in the mills. A large portion of these goods is woven in a circular web like the sleeve of your coat; they are cut out by machinery in the shape of stockings, and are then sent out by the hundreds and thousands among the people in the surrounding country to be toed and heeled, seamed and finished into completed stockings. This furnishes employment to a large number of people of whom the census takes no account whatever. Many families are earning from five to twenty dollars per month from this employment alone.

If you refuse to pass this bill you will not only stop the twenty-four hosiery mills of the State of New Hampshire but the three hundred and fifty-four establishments scattered through the nineteen States in which this industry has grown up. The following schedule, taken from the last report of the Census Bureau, shows the extent of this industry and the States in which it is carried on:

In the city where I reside one of these manufacturers contracted to deliver $125,000 worth of knit goods the coming fall, but since the decision recently rendered by the Supreme Court these orders have been countermanded, and I understand that is the condition of many of the other manufacturers in the country. If they have not the means to carry their goods over to another season and you fail to furnish them the relief asked for by the passage of this bill, their factories must be closed, their operatives turned out of employment, and their business ruined and destroyed.

Gentlemen contend that there is no error in the statutes to correct, and that the present law is what the Congress intended it should be. In this, I think, gentlemen are certainly in error, and a brief examination will demonstrate the truth of my statement.

By the act of March 2, 1861, (12 Statutes at Large, 191,) a duty of 30 per cent. ad valorem was imposed on a large number of articles, among which were the following: Clothing, ready made, and wearing apparel of every description, of whatever material composed, made up or manufactured, wholly or in part, by the tailor, seamstress, or manufacturer; also the following: caps, gloves, leggins, mitts, socks, stockings, wove shirts and drawers, and all similar articles made on frames, of whatever material composed, worn by men, women, or children, and not otherwise provided for; also the following: articles worn by men, women, or children, of whatever material composed, made up wholly or in part by hand, not otherwise provided for.

By the act of July 14, 1862, (12 Statutes at Large,) 556, an additional duty of 5 per cent. ad valorem was imposed on all the foregoing as well as on many other articles.

By the act of June 30, 1864, (13 Statutes at Large,) 208, the duty on "shirts, drawers, and hosiery of wool, or of which wool shall be a component material, not otherwise provided for," was changed to 20 cents per pound, and in addition thereto 30 per cent. ad valorem. By the same act, page 207, the duty on "clothing, ready made, and wearing apparel of every description, composed wholly or in part of wool, made up or manufactured wholly or in part by the tailor, seamstress, or manufacturer, except hosiery," was changed to 24 cents per pound, and in addition thereto 40 per cent. ad valorem. By the same act, page 209, besides providing for certain manufactures of flax not mentioned in the paragraphs quoted in the act of March 2, 1861, the duty on "all other manufactures of flax or of which flax should be the component material of chief value, not otherwise provided for," was changed to 40 per cent. ad valorem. By the same act, page 210, the duty on "all manufactures of silk, or of which silk is the component material of chief value, not otherwise provided for," was changed to 50 per cent. ad valorem.

By the act of March 2, 1867, (14 Statutes at Large, 561,) new rates of duty "in lieu of the duties heretofore imposed by law" on all the articles, if made of wool, before mentioned, were imposed as follows: "Woolen clothes, woolen shawls, and all manufactures of wool of every description made wholly or in part of wool, not herein otherwise provided for, 50 cents per pound, and in addition thereto 35 per cent. ad valorem; flannels, blankets, hats of wool, knit goods, balmorals, woolen and worsted yarns, and all manufactures of every discription composed wholly or in part of worsted, the hair of the alpaca, goat, or other like animals, except such as are composed in part of wool, not otherwise provided for, valued at not exceeding 40 cents per pound, 20 cents per pound; valued at 40 cents per pound, and not exceeding 60 cents per pound, 30 cents per pound; valued at above 60 cents per pound, and not exceeding 80 cents per pound, 40 cents per pound; valued at above 80 cents per pound, 50 cents per pound, and in addition thereto upon all the above-named articles, 35 per cent. ad valorem. Clothing ready made and wearing apparel of every description, and balmoral skirts and skirting and goods of similar des-ription or used for like purposes, composed wholly or in part of wool, worsted, the hair of the alpaca, goat, or other like animals, made up or manufactured wholly or in part by the tailor, seamstress, or manufacturer, except knit goods, 50 cents per pound, and in addition thereto 40 per cent. ad valorem." This act did not affect manufactures of silk and linen, but left them dutiable as before.

It is very plain that at the time of the revision of the statutes, in which no one questions that the laws in force December 1, 1873, without any alteration affecting the sense, were intended to be embodied, no article mentioned in the three paragraphs quoted from the act of March 2, 1861, remained dutiable, under that act, if made of wool, silk, or linen. The revisers incorporated in Schedule L of section 2504 the paragraphs quoted from the act of March 2, 1867, under which, from that date until the enactment of the Revised Statutes on June 22, 1874, all the articles mentioned in those three paragraphs were, if made of wool, clearly dutiable.

But the revisers in incorporating in one paragraph, in Schedule M, those three paragraphs from the act of March 2, 1861, which still remained in force as to articles made of cotton, although they properly inserted the words "except wool, silk, and linen" in the first of the three paragraphs, only inserted the words "except silk and linen" in the second and third, as follows:

Clothing, ready-made, and wearing apparel, of every description, of whatever material composed, except wool, silk, and linen, made up or manufactured wholly or in part by the tailor, seamstress, or manufacturer, not otherwise provided for; caps, gloves, leggins, mitts, socks, stockings, wove shirts and drawers, and all similar articles made on frames, of whatever material composed, except silk and linen, worn by men, women, or children, and not otherwise provided for; articles worn by men, women, or children, of whatever materials composed, except silk and linen, made up or made wholly or in part by hand, not otherwise provided for: 35 per cent. ad valorem.

The Supreme Court having held that the articles specifically mentioned in the second clause of this paragraph, from Schedule M, if made of wool, are dutiable under Schedule M, and not under Schedule L, which contains only a generel description of them, one single question is now presented for the consideration of the House, to wit, shall this error of the revisers be corrected? Shall the law be made as Congress intended it should be, and what it was at the time of the revision? From this brief history of the legislation upon this subject I think it will be apparent to all that an error occurred in the revision of the statutes. But, sir, it is immaterial to me whether there was an error in the revision of the Statutes or not. This industry has grown up very largely since 1867, and under the law as construed by the Treasury Department, which imposed the pound duties in addition to the ad valorem duty of 35 per cent.

The decision of the Supreme Court changes the construction of that law and removes all duties except 35 per cent. ad valorem, and under that construction of the law this industry will be blotted out of existence.

Now, whether it was an error which crept into the revision of the Statutes or arose from the improper interpretation of the statutes by the Department, so far as this great industry is concerned it is immaterial. Its condition is just as hopeless, its burdens are just as great, its perils are just as serious, and the demand for relief is just as equitable and urgent, whether the difficulty arises from the one cause or the other; and I trust that gentlemen will not vote against this bill but permit it to pass, and thereby save from destruction this growing industry, keep in operation these mills scattered throughout the country, and which furnish employment for so many honest and worthy employés. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KELLEY. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HUBBELL.]

Mr. HUBBELL. I desire only a minute or so to call attention to the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MORRISON.] That gentleman undertook to state here (and I suppose he thought he was stating what was exactly true) that in the manufacture of these goods a great amount of cotton is used; that there was but little wool used in the manufacture of any of these goods.

I cannot say how that is in other States; but I know that in my own State there are several large manufactures of these knit goods, and I know they use all wool in their manufacture. They simply rent or hire some carding manufactory and run it the entire time on these knit goods, using the wool the farmers produce, and then to make up the goods they employ the hundred boys and girls in the towns and country around about.

A large number of people in my State are thus employed, using entirely wool grown by our farmers. Hence it is but an act of simple justice that this bill should pass; and I hope it will receive the favorable consideration of this House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. MILLS. On that question I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. KELLEY and Mr. MORRISON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 140, noes 5.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes in the affirmative, making a quorum.

Mr. CARLISLE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 134, nays 49, not voting 107; as follows:

Mr. MONEY. If I were not paired on this question, I would vote "no."

Mr. SIMONTON. My attention being called away at the moment, I failed to vote when my name was called. I wish to say that I would have voted in the negative.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON. I move that the House insist on its non-concurrence in the amendments of the Senate to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as conferees on the part of the House the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CANNON, the gentleman from New York, Mr. HISCOCK, and the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. O'NEILL,] who was a member of the sub-committee on this bill, has, for reasons satisfactory to himself, declined to serve on the conference committee.

CROW INDIAN RESERVATION, MONTANA.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I move to suspend the rules so as to take from the Speaker's table and pass the bill (S. No. 1045) to accept and ratify an agreement with the Crow Indians for the sale of a portion of their reservation in the Territory of Montana required for the use of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying out the same. I suggest that the Clerk, in reading this bill, read only the legislative part, omitting the agreement recited, which has been twice read heretofore at the Clerk's desk, and will be found in the RECORD of April 25.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent that the agreement recited in the bill, which has heretofore been read, be now omitted from the reading, and that the Clerk read only the legislative portion of the bill.

Mr. BRAGG. I object.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Reserving the right to any one to demand the reading of the agreement if it shall be deemed necessary.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That a certain agreement made between the United States of America, represented by Llewellyn A. Luce, William H. Walker, and Charles A. Maxwell, special agents duly appointed in that behalf by the Secretary of the Interior, of the one part, and the Crow tribe of Indians resident on the Crow reservation, in the Territory of Montana, acting under the supervision and with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, of the other part, be, and the same is hereby, ratified and confirmed. Said agreement is executed by a majority of all the adult male Indians of the Crow tribe occupying or interested in the lands therein more particularly described, in conformity with the provisions contained in article 11, of the treaty with the Crow Indians of May 7, 1868, and is in the words following, namely:

"Whereas by section 1 of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, entitled 'An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, on the Pacific coast, by the northern route,' (thirteenth Statutes at Large, page 365,) the Northern Pacific Railroad Company was authorized and empowered to lay out, locate, construct, furnish, maintain, and enjoy a continuous railroad and telegraph line, with the appurtenances, namely, beginning at a point on Lake Superior in the State of Minnesota or Wisconsin, thence westerly by the most eligible railroad route, as shall be determined by said company, within the territory of the United States, on a line north of the forty-fifth degree of latitude, to some point on Puget Sound; and

"Whereas by section 2 of said act Congress granted to said company the right of way for the construction of said railroad and telegraph line to the extent of two hundred feet in width on each side of said railroad where it may pass through the public domain, including all necessary ground for station-buildings, workshops, depots, machine-shops, switches, side-tracks, turn-tables, and water-stations; and

"Whereas by said section 2 Congress provided that the United States should extinguish, as rapidly as may be consistent with public policy and the welfare of the Indians, the Indian titles to all lands falling under the operation of this act and acquired in the donation to the road named in the act; and

"Whereas by treaty between the United States and the Crow Indians concluded at Fort Laramie, May 7, 1868, and duly ratified and proclaimed, (fifteenth Statutes at Large, page 649,) a district of country in the Territory of Montana was set apart as a reservation for the absolute and undisturbed use and occupation of said Indians; and

"Whereas there is no provision or stipulation in said treaty authorizing said company or recognizing its right to construct its road through said reservation; and

"Whereas the said company did, on the 25th day of June, 1881, file in the Department of the Interior a map showing the definite location of its line of railroad from the one hundred and seventh degree of longitude west from Greenwich westwardly through said reservation and adjacent territory to the western boundary of the said reserve, as provided by said act of 1864, the company having first obtained the permission of the Secretary of the Interior to survey its line in said reservation; and

"Whereas the said company desires to construct its line of railroad upon such designated route, and claims the right by virtue of said act so to do:

"Now, therefore, in order to fulfill the obligations of the Government in the premises, this agreement, made this 22d day of August, A. D. 1881, between the Crow tribe of Indians, resident on the Crow reservation, in the Territory of Montana, represented by their chiefs, head men, and heads of a majority of families, and being a majority of all the adult male Indians occupying or interested in the lands hereinafter described, the said Indians acting under the supervision and with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior of the United States, of the one part, and the United States of America, represented by Llewellyn A. Luce, William H. Walker, and Charles A. Maxwell, special agents duly appointed in this behalf by the Secretary of the Interior, of the other part, witnesseth: That for the consideration hereinafter mentioned the Crow tribe of Indians do hereby surrender and relinquish to the United States all their right, title, and interest in and to all that part of the Crow reservation situate in the Territory of Montana and described as follows, namely:

"A strip of land not exceeding four hundred feet in width, that is to say, two hundred feet on each side of the line laid down on the map of definite location hereinbefore mentioned, wherever said line runs through said reservation between the one hundred and seventh degree of longitude west of Greenwich on the east and the mid-channel of the Big Boulder River on the west, containing 5,384 acres, more or less. An official copy of said map of definite location was, on this 22d day of August, A. D. 1881, produced before said special agents and the Indians in council, was fully explained to said Indians, and is hereunto attached, marked A, and made a part of this agreement. Also the several parcels of land situate along and adjoining the said strip of land hereinbefore mentioned between the one hundred and seventh degree of longitude west of Greenwich on the east and the mid-channel of the Big Boulder River on the west, as defined and described on a map produced before said special agents and the Indians in council on the day and date above mentioned, and fully explained to and understood by said Indians; said tracts being designated on the aforesaid map by the letters A, B, C, D, E, F, G, H, I, J, and K, and containing, respectively, the following area, that is to say: Tract A, 26.23 acres; tract B, 28.54 acres; tract C, 26.23 acres; tract E, 26.23 acres; tract F, 26.23 acres; tract G, 26.23 acres; tract H, 26.23 acres; tract I, 26.23 acres; tract J, 28.32 acres; tract K, 26.23 acres, aggregating two hundred and sixty-six acres, more or less, said map being hereunto attached, marked B, and made a part of this agreement; which last-mentioned tracts are intended for the use of said Northern Pacific Railroad Company for station-houses, depots, switches, &c. It is further stipulated and agreed that the United States will not permit the said railroad company, its employés or agents, to trespass upon any part of the lands of the Crow Indian reservation not hereby relinquished, nor permit said company, its employés, or agents, to cut any timber, wood, or hay from the lands embraced in said reservation.

"And it is further stipulated and agreed that the Secretary of the Interior, upon such terms as he may see fit to impose, may permit to be constructed, maintained, and used within said Crow Indian reservation wagon-roads not exceeding three in number, in addition to any established wagon-roads which may now be in use therein; the said three roads to connect with the line of said railroad at such points as the Secretary of the Interior may designate; all of which wagon-roads shall be under the control of the Government of the United States.

"In consideration of the lands hereby relinquished amounting in the aggregate to 5,650 acres, more or less, and for the privileges herein granted, the United States stipulates and agrees to pay to the Crow tribe of Indians the sum of $25,000, to be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the said tribe of Indians upon the ratification of this agreement by Congress, and the necessary appropriation made therefor, the sum aforesaid to be expended for the benefit of said Indians in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may direct; the same to be in addition to any and all moneys to which the said Indians are entitled under the provisions of the treaty of May 7, 1868, hereinbefore mentioned.

"All provisions of existing treaties with the Crow Indians not affected by this agreement are to remain in full force and effect, and this agreement is to be subject to ratification by Congress.

"Executed at Crow Agency, in the Territory of Montana, this 22d day of August, A. D., 1881, as witness the following signatures."

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into effect, the sum of $25,000 is hereby set aside, out of any moneys in the United States Treasury not otherwise oppropriated, to be deposited in the United States Treasury to the credit of the Crow tribe of Indians, and to be expended for the benefit of the said Indians in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may direct.

SEC. 3. That the right of way over the land relinquished by said agreement to the United States for the construction of said Northern Pacific Railroad, and the use of the several parcels of land so relinquished intended to be used for depots, stations, sidings, &c., for said railroad, are hereby granted to said Northern Pacific Railroad Company, its successors and assigns, for the uses and purposes in said agreement set forth; but the land, or any part thereof, relinquished to the United States by said agreement shall not be used for railroad purposes by or for the said Northern Pacific Railroad Company, its successors or assigns, except upon the condition precedent that the said company, its successors or assigns, shall, within sixty days from the taking effect of this act, pay to the Treasurer of the United States said sum of $25,000 hereby appropriated to be paid by the United States for the lands relinquished to the United States by said agreement, and shall within the same time file with the Secretary of the Interior its written acceptance of the conditions of this section; nor shall said land, or any part thereof, be continued to be used for railroad purposes by or for said Northern Pacific Railroad Company, its successors or assigns, except upon the further condition that said company, its successors or assigns, will pay any and all damages which the United States or said Indians, individually or in their tribal capacity, or any other Indians lawfully occupying said reservation, may sustain by reason or on account of the act or acts of said company, its successors or assigns, its agents or employés, or on account of fires originating by or in the construction or operation of said railroad, the damages in all cases to be recovered in any court of the Territory of Montana having jurisdiction of the amount claimed, upon suit or action instituted by the proper United States attorney in the name of the United States: Provided, That the said United States attorney may accept such sum of money in satisfaction of any such injury or damages as in his discretion may be just; and if so accepted before suit or action is commenced, no suit or action shall be instituted, and if accepted after commencement of suit or action, the same shall be dismissed at the cost of said company, its successors, or assigns.

SEC. 4. That all moneys accepted or recovered under the provisions of section 3 of this act shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States, and if accepted or recovered on account of damages sustained by said Indians as aforesaid, they shall be placed to the credit of said Indians in their tribal names, to be expended by the Secretary of the Interior for the benefit of said Indians in such manner as he may deem for their best interest, except in the case of an individual Indian, when the amount covered into the Treasury shall be expended for his sole benefit.

Mr. RYAN. I hope the gentleman from Montana will explain this bill so we may understand it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust it will be understood that there has been a second.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the motion to suspend the rules will be considered as seconded.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope there will be no objection, for the reason I wish to ascertain whether this has been recommended by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and whether it has been before any committee of this House.

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules is seconded.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the briefest statement of the facts will convince the House that this bill should be passed. I hold in my hand an executive document containing the message of Chester A. Arthur, the President of the United States, which contains the letter of Secretary Kirkwood, lately the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting copies of this agreement to Congress and recommending its passage. Also, the letter of Hiram Price, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in whose office I believe the bill was drawn, asking for its favorable consideration.

If desired, I will have these letters read at the conclusion of my remarks, but members can find them in Senate Executive Document 61, as also in the report of the House Committee of Indian Affairs, on a precisely similar bill to this. That committee, I may remark, unanimously reported in favor of the passage of the bill. The House report can be found on the Calendar, No. 582.

It will, however, save time, and I am sure my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will accept my statements, while I go over in a few moments the points involved in the pending measure.

The line of the Northern Pacific Railroad runs across the northeastern corner of the Crow reservation. This reservation, by the way, is, notwithstanding its recent reduction, as large as a good-sized New England State. When the company reached this reservation in the course of the construction of its road the company made the claim that they possessed the right of way across the reservation under their charter. Their charter outdated by many years the creation of the reservation by treaty. The company therefore claimed their legal rights to take this land without compensation. Secretary Kirkwood conceded the legality of the claim, but he urged upon the company that it would be a matter of good policy and equity to hold a conference with the Indians and to pay them for the lands occupied, setting aside all legal questions.

This was agreed to. A commission consisting of one of the assistants of the Attorney-General and two other trusted officers of the Interior Department were sent out. They held a conference with the Indians and made this agreement for the right of way. This agreement was signed by a large majority of the chiefs, head men, and warriors of the Crow tribe. The Indians granted the right of way through their lands, or the lands they claimed, and also certain lands for stations and side-tracks, and for this concession the United States agreed to pay the Indians $25,000, that amount being paid into the Treasury by the railroad company. So that the House will see that this bill makes no charge on the public Treasury. The company has already built their grade and occupied the Indian lands. Now, all there is in this bill is to permit the railroad to pay according to the agreement, and that is all there is of it. The amount of land covered by the agreement is 5,653¼ acres.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does it grant any land to this railroad?

Mr. MAGINNIS. Certainly not. As I have said, the total number of acres is the 5,650 acres covered by the agreement.

Mr. HOLMAN. As I understand the gentleman that is included in the right of way.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Certainly. I believe now, Mr. Speaker, that there is no further objection urged to this bill, and unless some further explanations be demanded I ask that it be put upon its passage.

The rules were suspended, two-thirds voting in favor thereof; and the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced the passage of a bill (S. No. 996) to provide for the erection of a public building at Asheville, North Carolina, in which concurrence was requested.

It also announced the passage of a concurrent resolution that the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to exchange, under the direction of the joint Committee on Printing, duplicate volumes of the Congressional Globe in his custody for volumes of which there may be a deficiency.

It further announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 6244) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House, and asked for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as managers of such conference on its part Mr. ALLISON, Mr. DAWES, and Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia.

SALE OF OLD POST-OFFICE SITE, NEW YORK.

Mr. McCOOK. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and take from the Speaker's table and pass the bill (S. No. 1774) authorizing the sale of land and premises formerly occupied as a site for the post-office in the city of New York.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to sell at public auction in the city of New York to the highest bidder, after thirty days' notice in four of the principal newspapers published in the city of New York, the land and premises formerly occupied as the site of the post-office in the city of New York, lying upon Nassau street, between Cedar and Liberty streets, and known as the Old Post-Office site; the time and place of said sale in said city to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury at a date not later than ninety days after the passage of this act, and at a price not less than $500,000, with power to reject any and all bids, and to readvertise and offer the said property in like manner as often as may be necessary to secure the value thereof; and if he deems it best for the public interest, he may subdivide said land into parcels and sell in such parcels.

Mr. HOLMAN. For the purpose of having some explanation I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the motion to suspend the rules will be considered as seconded.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. No; let us have a vote on seconding the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. McCOOK. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to allow a second in order that there may be an explanation.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Raise the price from $500,000 to $1,000,000, and I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. McCOOK. Will members of the committee have an object to question the passage of this bill?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will withdraw my objection to allow a second to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no further objection, and the motion to suspend the rules is seconded.

Mr. McCOOK. Mr. Speaker, I do not know I have anything to say at this time in regard to this bill, nor will I have anything to say unless the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] or some one opposed to it shall make statements requiring correction. This is a Senate bill. It has met the approval of the committee of this House, I believe the unanimous approval of that committee. I believe every member of the House of Representatives from the city of New York, six Democrats and one Republican, favor it. It is a bill which should pass the House. As soon as gentlemen objecting to it, if there be any, have been heard, I hope the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] will be heard, and also the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. COOK.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have received several communications from citizens of New York in regard to the proposed sale of this piece of property, and it has been suggested that at least there should be a greater limitation placed upon the property than that which this bill indicates. It is said the property is worth $1,000,000, and that only a small portion perhaps of the men actively engaged in business in that city desire its sale. It is believed by others, and has been so expressed, that the interests of the Government would be best served by retaining possession of it for Government purposes. These conflicting views are worthy of serious consideration before making any disposition of it in the manner proposed by this bill. Questions may arise when it may become desirable that this property should be owned by the Government, and our experience in the past has demonstrated the fact that we always sell our property at very cheap rates, and purchase, when we have occasion to purchase, at extravagant prices.

Now, I suggest to the gentleman from New York who makes this motion that the price here fixed as a minimum should be increased to $1,000,000 at least, as I regard that, in view of all the facts connected with this matter, as only a reasonable and fair value to place upon that property; and I also suggest this with the view of preventing any possible combination which may be formed in New York to control the sale of the property—for that city is as liable to combination as other cities—that no combination shall be able to obtain control of the property at a less price than its value, in view of the fact that the Government is not compelled to sell it, certainly not compelled to sell it for less than it is worth. I had a letter from a very intelligent gentleman from New York City, whose name I cannot now recall, but I remember that he was long identified with the principal business interests of the city, and upon that letter I also base my suggestions, as well as for the reasons I have already mentioned, first, that there is no reason why the property should be sacrificed for a dollar less than its value; and, in the second place, there is no pressing necessity for selling it.

Again, by changing the minimum fixed in this bill and placing it at $1,000,000 instead of $500,000 it will prevent any possible combination, and secure to the Government the full value of the property. I trust, therefore, the gentleman from New York will consent to an amendment fixing the amount at the sum I have indicated.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me the remainer of his time?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; I have said all I desire to say.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Then I prefer to reserve the time until after I shall have heard from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SHALLENBERGER.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The propriety of selling this old post-office site has not been doubted so far as I know by any Secretary of the Treasury for the last six or eight years. On the contrary, the present Secretary of the Treasury has strongly recommended to Congress that the property should be sold at public auction. The last preceding Secretary of the Treasury made a like recommendation, stating that in his judgment the property was not now needed nor would it be for public uses. It is a piece of property 185 by 115 feet, and is in the heart of the city of New York. It is too small for any prospective use of the Government, and, besides, it is much too valuable as a site on which to construct a public building for purposes likely to be demanded by the Government.

I need not stop to name the several reasons which have been urged for the sale of this property. It cost the Government $250,000 in 1850, $50,000 of which was contributed by citizens of New York, and has been recommended to be sold by the last three Congresses. These several bills failed to become laws, although the sale has been strongly recommended by the several Committees on Ways and Means of the House to whom the bill was then referred, merely because, under the rules of the House, one objection defeated the several attempts at consideration. The proposition to sell this property has never been discussed upon its merits before the House, or otherwise it would have carried. We now propose to bring it before the House on its merits; but regret that we have only fifteen minutes in which to favor its passage. This bill which comes to us from the Senate, and which it is now proposed to pass under a suspension of the rules, is a duplicate of the bill reported favorably from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of this House with slight amendment. The House bill has been upon the Calendar, with a report which I hold in my hand, one of the most exhaustive and carefully prepared reports the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has prepared during this Congress.

We gave notice of our desire to hear any and all gentlemen from New York who had a word to say as to the propriety of selling this piece of property. We had members of Congress from the city of New York before us. We had the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York through its representatives, and took stenographic notes of the proceedings in committee. The New York press had called attention to the fact that this was in contemplation, and they got up a public interest in the question which tended to develop all the opposition that could legitimately be brought against the proposed sale. We invited the freest and fullest possible discussion of the measure. We invited gentlemen who were opposed to the bill to come and discuss it in committee. But a single gentleman from the city of New York appeared in opposition to it, and he is the lessee of this piece of property, who is making his thousands of dollars out of the lease yearly. No other gentleman from the city or any part of the State of New York came before the committee to urge a single objection to the sale of the property. As I have stated, the Treasury Department under different administrations recommended the sale under proper regulations. Committees of this House in three or four Congresses have reported in favor of sale.

Now, I take it, under these circumstances the question of disposing of this property has been settled affirmatively. The next question to be considered is, is this bill carefully guarded as to the terms of sale? I think it is. First, we provide this property cannot be sold until after thirty days' public notice in four of the leading newspapers in the city of New York, and within ninety days after the passage of this act. More than that, we provide that if in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury he does not deem it best to sell the property as a whole, he may subdivide it and sell it in parcels. We provide that he shall sell it after the largest possible competition, and, if necessary to protect the Government, he may readvertise the property as often as he may deem it best, said notice of thirty days previously given.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Does the bill provide the property shall be offered as a whole or in severalty, or is it left to the discretion of the Secretary?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The bill leaves it to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. It enjoins upon the Secretary to get the largest price possible for the property, and in order to sell it advantageously he may readvertise it from time to time, having only in view the best interests of the Government.

Now, I say that in my judgment and in the judgment of the members from the city of New York, and in the judgment of the press of the city of New York, no bill ever before this House has been more carefully guarded than this so as to secure all the rights of the Government. We limit the price to a minimum of $500,000. We do not know what it will bring.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Why not make the minimum a million dollars?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We do not put it at a million because there is a wide diversity of views as to the value of it, and there may be $900,000 offered as the very best bid that can be secured. We say in the case of property costing $250,000, and after the most liberal advertising, after all the capitalists and corporate bodies in the city of New York or elsewhere have had a chance of bidding at a public sale, the Government ought not to deny itself the advantage of selling this property merely for a possible difference of $100,000, more or less.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is it not conceded generally the property is worth at least a million dollars?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. There is no concession of that kind. We simply say we limit it as a minimum to $500,000. Responsible gentlemen from the city of New York have said that is all it is worth. Others say it is worth $550,000; others say $600,000; some say $700,000; some have gone as high as a million, and I am not quite sure but that some have put it at $1,250,000. What we say is, put it up for sale at the proper season of the year, under regulations such as we name, and at public auction; let every real-estate man in New York, after reading the advertisement for thirty days, come and bid; and if any man or company of men think the property is worth a million, or can be resold for a million, will they suffer it to go for $500,000? I guess they will not. All the safeguards that can be thrown around the sale of public property have been thrown around this. The requirements of the Government for this property for public purposes have ceased for years. The Secretary of the Treasury says we shall not need it. The proceeds of sale are to be turned into the Treasury of the United States. The Committee of Public Buildings and Grounds, after careful investigation, therefore recommend that the bill, as it comes from the Senate, substantially the bill we have prepared, shall pass this House.

Mr. BRAGG. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Why should not the word "shall" be used instead of the word "may," so as to compel the property to be sold in subdivisions, which would bring it within the reach of men of lesser capital?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will say the only reason is that the property may be wanted for a specific purpose, and that it may bring a larger price as a whole than it would if sold in subdivisions.

Mr. BRAGG. I thought that would be the answer. But is not that fully met by the suggestion that if the property be subdivided and if a combination desire to buy the whole of it they may buy each separate parcel and acquire a title to the whole? But putting it up in separate parcels gives a chance to individual bidders, and a higher price will be obtained.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. But some one might get one of the parcels, and then the balance of the property might be utterly worthless, at least inadequate for the purposes for which a larger price might be paid.

Mr. BRAGG. I ask the gentleman if in his judgment any property in that section of New York will ever be worthless?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It might be very valuable for a specific purpose; and property bought for that specific purpose might bring a larger price. Hence we do not want to enforce on the Secretary of the Treasury the necessity of selling the property in parcels, as that provision would prevent him possibly from securing the largest price from the class of bidders who would use the entire lot for a very expensive structure of great height perhaps, and thus be able to pay more proportionately for the ground. But the present Secretary of the Treasury will fully protect the Government, I am sure, in the exercise of the proper discretion we have given him. The Government has no need for this property and has no right to hold it in its dilapidated condition. If gentlemen will read our report and the testimony of the lessee, who profits by delay in passing this bill, they will find that he has inspired many of the objections urged upon this floor to the passage of the bill.

SALE OF OLD POST-OFFICE SITE, NEW YORK.

Mr. McCOOK. I yield for a moment to my colleague from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. COX, of New York. In the absence of my colleagues [Mr. FLOWER and Mr. HEWITT] I beg to say one word. I never was invited to this committee that I am aware of. I believe this property to be worth, and I believe it will bring in the market, at least $1,000,000, provided there is a fair sale to the highest bidder by auction. I do not know but my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] has properly described this bill; but I will say to the House that there appears to be some little jealousy or caution about putting this sum of $1,000,000 into the bill. I do not know what it springs from; but I think the property being worth $1,000,000 it would be a wise thing for the gentleman from Pennsylvania to insert $1,000,000 instead of $500,000.

Mr. McCOOK. On what does my colleague base his estimates?

Mr. COX, of New York. On the statements of men who told me they would put up $750,000 for the property, and would bid a million for it. I can get nothing better than that.

Mr. McCOOK. I will ask the chairman of the committee [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] what was the highest estimate of the value of the property before that committee?

Mr. COX, of New York. At the time that estimate was made as to the value of this property, perhaps there was not full intelligence given to the committee.

Mr. McCOOK. Perhaps so.

Mr. COX, of New York. The Chamber of Commerce of the City of New York wanted it for a sum that would enable them to get pay for an old debt. That is wiped out of this bill now.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Altogether?

Mr. COX, of New York. I think that my friend from Pennsylvania will be able to pass the bill if he will fix the limitation at $1,000,000.

Mr. McCOOK. Two previous Congresses put the limitation at $250,000.

Mr. COX, of New York. All property in that part of the city, from the nadir to the zenith, has become intensified in value; so valuable that you could rent this property at almost any percentage on a million of dollars.

Mr. McCOOK. My colleague [Mr. HEWITT] stated that in his judgment this property was worth in the neighborhood of $750,000.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. He said that it was worth a million of dollars.

Mr. McCOOK. That it might be; and it will bring that amount if that is correct.

Mr. COOK. He did not say so to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. COX, of New York. I am only telling the House, from what I know of tricks sometimes vain and sometimes not vain, that we ought to guard this bill carefully, and there can be no better guard than fixing the minimum at $1,000,000.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. The reason the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] was not before the committee was that he was not here, for I made it my business to try and look him up, and I could not find him. The other members from the city of New York were present, and all concurred in the propriety of reporting a bill for the sale of this property.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I believe that the remainder of the time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] was yielded to me.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman will yield for a minute or two.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. How much time have I left of the time of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN?]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has ten minutes left.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] spoke only about four minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] will yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] for two minutes now.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will do so, and then I think I shall have ten minutes left.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I simply want to say that when this subject of the sale of this property was first broached I was written to by a very prominent real-estate agent in New York, who informed me that the property was worth at least $1,000,000; I understood him to say that he could get buyers for it at that sum. I have made inquiries about the matter, and I think it is worth at least one and a quarter million of dollars.

In conversing with my friend from New York, [Mr. McCOOK,] I understood from him that the bill was in such a shape that there would be full advertising and fair competition for this property before it was sold. Under these circumstances, with proper guards, I have no doubt the property will bring its full value. I am in favor, however, of making the limit at least $1,000,000, if not more.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I have no more interest in this matter than the gentleman from New York [Mr. McCOOK] or any other member; but I have just as much interest in it as he or any other member on this floor, and so has the constituency which I represent here as much interest in this property as any other constituency. Therefore it is my duty to see that the rights of the public are carefully guarded; I am governed by that motive alone.

Some four years ago a bill was reported from this committee recommending the sale of this property at a minimum of $250,000, of which sum about $25,000 was allowed to the Chamber of Commerce or Stock Exchange, or some other commercial body, in payment of some old claim.

Mr. COX, of New York. To the Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. To be given to the Chamber of Commerce. That has been eliminated from this bill, and the minimum price has now been fixed at $500,000.

Four years ago, about the time when the question was up for the sale of this property at $250,000, I was standing one day opposite the property, in New York, in company with an ex-Secretary of the Treasury, and he stated to me then that the property was then worth every dollar of $1,000,000, and I was told by others that a combination was organized with a view to obtain the property at a less value than it was really worth.

I am not desirous of defeating the purpose of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to secure the sale of this property; but I want to put such restrictions on the bill as will prevent it falling into the hands of a combination of speculators at less than its real value. This bill provides that the property shall be sold for cash. It is not likely that any party will purchase it on those terms except some combination of capitalists. It ought to provide for a sale on time, as is generally done, except where forced sales are made. Prudence dictates this as the surest way to obtain the best price.

Another objection to the bill is that it is left discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury whether the property shall be sold in subdivisions or not. I am glad the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] and his colleague [Mr. ROBINSON] have given us the benefit of their knowledge upon the value of this property. I am well convinced that the opinion of a majority of the best judges of real estate in New York City is that this property is worth more than $1,000,000. Now, sir, I understand the Government is paying rent in that city of over $75,000 for the use of buildings for governmental purposes.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. The gentleman has got that three times too much.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Do I understand you to say three times more? Do they pay more?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. They are not paying over $27,000.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am informed that my friend is mistaken, and that the Government is now paying over $75,000 for rents of buildings used for pension agencies, for Quartermaster's Department, and various other purposes. I cannot say of my own knowledge how much is paid for rent, but I have been advised by those who claim to fully understand the facts that the figures I have given are correct. Now, Mr. Speaker, good business men in New York, on Wall, Broad, and Broadway, believe that this is an excellent location for some of the purposes of the Government, especially for the pension agencies.

Mr. McCOOK. Will the gentleman vote for an appropriation to put up a building there?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Where is this property located? It is at the corner of Cedar and Nassau streets, within two blocks of the Stock Exchange, within two blocks of Wall street, and within one block of Broadway. It is in the very heart of the business part of the city and of the most valuable real estate in New York City. Yet this property, which I am confident is worth $1,000,000, this bill proposes to offer at a minimum price of $500,000. If the minimum suggested by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] $1,000,000, were agreed to, I would not oppose the bill, because I see that there are interested parties in New York who are determined the property shall be sold, and sooner or later they will secure a sale. I will not, then, oppose the sale of the property, although it is believed by many prudent men in New York that it is far better for the Government to hold the property and make use of it in erecting upon it needed Government buildings. It may not be long before a clamor will be raised for new public buildings in New York; then you will find that the Government will be compelled to pay an enormous price for the ground to place them upon.

Why this great eagerness to sell this property? It is becoming more valuable every day. Four years ago it was stated by some to be worth only $250,000. Now the committee comes in and admits that it is worth $500,000, and, as I have already said to you, some of the very best business men and judges of the value of real estate in New York assert that it is worth over $1,000,000. Indeed I have heard it estimated at $1,250,000.

While this property is growing in value every day, why do gentlemen insist that it shall be sold at all? And if sold at all, why insist on fixing as the minimum figure half its actual value? The Government, with a plethoric Treasury, is not compelled to sacrifice this property. In fairness to the interests of the people and the public Treasury, why not accept the amendment fixing the minimum at $1,000,000? If I owned the property and were able to hold it, I would not accept one cent less than a million dollars for it; and if I could not get that price to-day, I would hold the property till I could get it; for that is no more than it is worth. I have nothing further to say, except that if the amendment to fix the minimum price at $1,000,000 be accepted I shall not object further to the passage of the bill; but as the Government is under no necessity to sell the property, I do not wish to leave open the danger of a sacrifice of this property.

Mr. McCOOK. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SINGLETON.]

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, no subject before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds at this session has received so much careful investigation as that involved in this bill. We had before us the best men from the city of New York; we had all the members from that city before us, except my friend from New York, [Mr. COX,] who at that time, I believe, was absent from the city. Every person heard before our committee concurred in the conclusion of the committee that the property ought to be sold and that the limit of $500,000 was a safe one. Nobody has estimated the value of the property at $1,000,000. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] his colleague, [Mr. FLOWER,] and various other gentlemen said it was valuable property, and there was no telling what price it might command because it was so desirable for private purposes.

But for the Government it is not desirable. The Quartermaster's Department is the only branch of the Government needing a building in New York City at this time. So far from the Government paying $75,000 for rental in that city, as my colleague asserts, the highest amount paid in that way is $33,000, according to the report made by Mr. Conant, the present lessee of the building, who has been hanging around the halls of this House and the room of our committee for the purpose of preventing the sale of the property, so that he might continue its lessee. He admits that $33,000 is all that the Government is called to pay in the way of rent. I will only add that under this bill the Secretary of the Treasury will have the power to advertise and readvertise the property as often as he pleases until it commands what it is worth in the market.

Mr. McCOOK. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. COOK.]

Mr. COOK. As a member of the committee to which this bill was referred, I wish to say that the testimony of a very large number of gentlemen as to the value of this property was taken before the committee; and not one of them thought that the property was worth $1,000,000. The estimates ranged from $350,000 to $500,000 and $600,000; and one was as high as $700,000. This property is rented for $12,500 a year to a gentleman who has been here constantly, and has taken very great interest in protecting the Government by preventing the sale of the property.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Why does not the Government raise the rent on him?

Mr. COOK. This property is to be vacated on six days' notice; but I think he could pay a larger rent than he does. In my opinion the property is worth more than $500,000; I have no question of it; but I believe, under this bill, which intrusts the sale to the Secretary of the Treasury, the property will bring every dollar of its market value. A minimum is named in the bill, because everybody thought there ought to be some limitation of that kind; but I have no doubt, notwithstanding this limit, that the property under the provisions of this bill will bring its full market value.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McCOOK. Mr. Speaker, I regret exceedingly that my colleagues, [Mr. HEWITT and Mr. FLOWER,] who appeared before the committee, are not here to-day. They are both owners of real estate in New York City and to some extent experts in regard to its value. I profess to know nothing in regard to the value of this property, save what I hear from them and other competent gentlemen. I do not believe, however, from what I hear, as that seems to be the question on which this turns, that this property is worth $1,000,000. If it is worth $1,000,000, certainly no bill since I have had the honor to hold a seat in this House has been brought into the House more carefully guarded than this is.

And this is a Senate bill. It has passed the scrutiny of that body; it has passed the scrutiny and received the unanimous approval of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of this House.

Personally, sir, I care nothing about the passage of this bill. I believe it is in the best interest of the Government of the United States, and I believe in addition to that it is in the best interests of the city of New York.

Mr. COX, of New York. Will not my colleague agree to insert $750,000 in the bill?

Mr. McCOOK. I would not insert a cent; I would not change it if the property was never sold. The Government can hold that property and deprive the city of New York of $50,000 of tax as long as it pleases.

Mr. COX, of New York. This has nothing to do with partisanship.

The SPEAKER. The time for debate has expired.

The question recurred on Mr. McCOOK's motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 84, noes 37.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make the point of no quorum?

Mr. HOLMAN. I will demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Have the yeas and nays been ordered? I insist there is no quorum unless we can have the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Nineteen have voted in favor of the yeas and nays, which in the judgment of the Chair, is not a sufficient number.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The point comes too late.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I made it as soon as the gentleman from Indiana withdrew it.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman withdrew it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I immediately made the point of no quorum unless we could have the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. And immediately withdrew it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask a count on the other side on the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I rose to my feet and made the point of no quorum, and remained on my feet insisting on the point of no quorum. The gentleman from Indiana made the point, but withdrew it, and I renewed it unless we could have the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the Chair is mistaken. I did not withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am willing, if we can have the yeas and nays to show how these members vote, to withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. Nineteen have voted in the affirmative and sixty-seven in the negative, and one-fifth having voted in the affirmative the yeas and nays are ordered. The Chair desires to state, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois, that it does not think the yeas and nays can be demanded and at the same time the point of no quorum reserved. Nor can there be any conditional withdrawal. The demand for the yeas and nays necessarily vacated the point of order that no quorum was present.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 92, nays 73, not voting 125; as follows:

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the motion to suspend the rules was not agreed to.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. RUSSELL with Mr. KENNA.

Mr. WISE, of Virginia. I move to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. COBB. I object.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. FORNEY. I move to suspend the rules——

Mr. COBB. I insisted that the names should be read. I made objection to dispensing with the reading of the names, and have not withdrawn it.

Mr. VALENTINE. The gentleman did not rise from his seat to object.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana insist that the names shall be read?

Mr. COBB. I do insist.

Mr. VALENTINE. The gentleman did not rise from his seat, and it is now too late.

Mr. WILSON. Why take up the time of the House in having the names read?

Mr. COBB. I think it will be in the interest of economy to do so.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Indiana states that he rose in his place and objected to dispensing with the reading of the names the Chair will order them to be read.

Mr. COBB. The Chair rather gets me on that question. [Laughter.] I did not rise.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks, then, that the gentleman makes his objection too late.

MINERAL LANDS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. FORNEY. I move to suspend the rules, discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4757) to exclude the public lands in Alabama from the operation of the law relating to mineral lands, and put the same upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read. It is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That within the State of Alabama all public lands, whether mineral or otherwise, shall be subject to disposal only as agricultural lands: Provided, however, That all lands which have heretofore been reported to the General Land Office as containing coal and iron shall first be offered at public sale: And provided further, That any bona fide entry under the provisions of the homestead law of lands within said State heretofore made may be patented without reference to an act approved May 10, 1872, entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," in cases where the persons making application for such patents have in all other respects complied with the homestead law relating thereto.

Mr. DWIGHT. I demand a second on the motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DWIGHT. I would like to know whether this bill has been reported by a committee of the House, or considered in Committee of the Whole House?

Mr. FORNEY. My motion is to discharge the Committee of the Whole from its further consideration and put it upon its passage.

Mr. DWIGHT. I understand this bill has never been considered by the Committee on Public Lands of this House.

Mr. FORNEY. During the last session of Congress it was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, who reported favorably upon it. During the present session the Speaker sent it to the Committee on Mines and Mining, and they have reported the bill unanimously.

It proposes to take all these public mineral lands in the State of Alabama and offer them at public sale to the highest bidder, so the Government will get the fullest price for them that is possible to be received, and after they are disposed of the remainder of the public lands in the State shall be subject to disposal only as other agricultural lands belonging to the Government.

Mr. ANDERSON. Where are these lands?

Mr. FORNEY. In the northern and northwest portions of the State of Alabama. This simply places the State of Alabama with reference to the public lands in that State upon an identical footing with Kansas, Michigan, Minnesota, and other States.

Mr. DWIGHT. My objection, Mr. Speaker, is that in the first place the State of Alabama has already received a large proportion of the public lands, altogether something over four and a half million acres; and further, I object because this bill has not been considered in either the Committee on Public Lands or by the Committee of the Whole. It is an important bill; it disposes of too much of the public property, and is entirely too important to be passed in this summary manner. I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. FORNEY. The gentleman fron New York is certainly mistaken in the objects of this bill. This simply proposes to sell the mineral lands, or to put them up at public sale to the highest bidder. If you do not make some such disposition, what do you propose to do with them?

Mr. CASSIDY. This does not donate an acre of land of the State of Alabama.

Mr. FORNEY. Not an acre.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 93, noes 17.

Mr. DWIGHT. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. DWIGHT and Mr. FORNEY were appointed tellers.

The House again divided.

Before the vote was announced,

Mr. DWIGHT said: Mr. Speaker, there does not seem to be a quorum present. Now, I have no objection to the bill if it is right. If it is right and proper to pass it I should be as glad to see it passed as anybody who has voted for it. My objection to it, however, is that it involves a good deal, and I do not believe there is anybody here who knows how much it really involves or what its provisions are. Now, if the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CONVERSE,] who, I am informed, examined this bill last year, will explain its provisions satisfactorily I shall have no objection to withdrawing the point of no quorum.

Mr. FORNEY. Mr. Speaker, I will now explain briefly the provisions of this bill in the presence of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CONVERSE,] who will, I am sure, bear out my statements. The lands in Alabama were offered for sale in 1819. The graduation act came along in 1852, and these identical lands were offered at 12½ cents an acre, and could find no purchaser. Recently, in 1879, the Secretary of the Interior, supposing they contained some valuable coal and minerals, sent a geologist down to examine them. He reported that there were some valuable coal lands among them. Since that time there has not been an acre of them sold. The Commissioner of the General Land Office is in favor of this bill, and drafted it and sent it here as a substitute for a bill of the same character. The bill proposes that all the mineral lands in Alabama which have been withdrawn by the order of the Secretary of the Interior shall be sold at public sale so that the Government will get its highest price for them.

Mr. DWIGHT. In what manner?

Mr. FORNEY. At public sale under the general law at not less than $1.25 an acre. Then after public sale these lands are open and subject to entry as agricultural lands. Now, what more do you want? The Government gets the money. If they are valuable lands they will bring more than $1.25. If they will not bring more they will have to be sold as agricultural lands at $1.25 per acre.

Mr. CONVERSE. I desire to say that the statement of the gentleman from Alabama is substantially right. This was recommended by the land department last year.

The SPEAKER. Is the point of no quorum withdrawn?

Mr. DWIGHT. Yes, sir; as it is apparent that the House is quite unanimously determined to pass the bill and further objection will not change the result. Still I insist the bill should not be passed in this manner if at all.

Mr. STRAIT. I renew the point of order as to a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The tellers will resume their places.

Mr. STRAIT. This bill opens mineral lands to homestead and pre-emption.

Mr. WILSON. Oh, no; the bill is all right.

Mr. STRAIT. The bill is not all right.

The tellers resumed the count and reported—ayes 137, noes 9.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill and joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 5536) to reissue a Treasury draft originally issued to George G. Cobb, an assistant assessor in Alabama, deceased, to J. E. Cobb, custodian of the minor children of said decedent; and

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 249) amending a paragraph in the "act for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department," approved May 1, 1882, and to correct an error in the enrollment thereof.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 1830) to amend section 2325 of the Revised Statutes, touching the issuance of patents for mineral lands;

A bill (S. No. 2060) to authorize the sale of timber on certain lands reserved for the use of the Menomonee tribe of Indians, in the State of Wisconsin; and

A bill (S. No. 2084) to encourage and promote telegraphic communication between America and Europe.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SAINT JOSEPH, MISSOURI.

Mr. FORD. I move that the rules be suspended and that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 929) for the erection of a public building in the city of Saint Joseph, in the State of Missouri, and that the bill be passed.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with fire-proof vault extending to each story, for the accommodation of the post-office, custom-house, bonded warehouse, internal-revenue offices, and other Government offices, at the city of Saint Joseph, in the State of Missouri. The site and building thereon, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed the cost of $125,000: Provided, That no money to be appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site of said building shall be vested in the United States, and until the State of Missouri shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil processes therein.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $50,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be used and expended toward the construction of said building.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for a second on this bill.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

Mr. BRAGG. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on Mr. BRAGG's motion there were—ayes 16, noes 62.

Mr. BRAGG. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered, only nine members voting therefor; not one-fifth of a quorum.

Mr. BRAGG. I call for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 6; not a sufficient number.

Mr. BRAGG. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers on the yeas and nays were not ordered, only eight members voting therefor; not one-fifth of a quorum.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG. I desire to move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not now in order. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has demanded a second on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. FORD.] The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. FORD] will act as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 119, noes 11.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. FORD] agrees that a motion may be entered to reduce the amount of the limit in the bill from $125,000 to $75,000.

Mr. FORD. I am willing to amend the bill as indicated by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BRAGG. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that it is agreed a motion may be entered to reduce the limit.

Mr. BRAGG. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The tellers will resume their places.

The tellers resumed the count and reported ayes 130, noes 16.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

Mr. FORD. I consented to admit an amendment to the bill making the limit $75,000, presuming there would be no further opposition to its consideration. I now insist on the consideration of the original bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think my friend from Missouri should not do that. I was very eager to accomplish that purpose, but the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] objected. I think the gentleman should allow the amendment.

Mr. FORD. In deference to the gentleman from Indiana, I will do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. FORD] now moves to pass the bill with an amendment making the limit of the expenditure $75,000.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Missouri how much is now paid in the city of Saint Joseph for rent?

Mr. FORD. At this time the rent is quite insignificant.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. How much?

Mr. FORD. Three hundred dollars for the post-office.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. How much for the use of the United States courts?

Mr. FORD. We have no court there.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. How much for an office for the collector of internal revenue?

Mr. FORD. The collector uses his own premises and charges no rent.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. The entire amount then paid as rent is $300?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

The rules were suspended (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) and the bill as modified, by striking out "$125,000" and inserting "$75,000," was passed.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AT HARRISONBURGH AND ABINGDON, VIRGINIA.

Mr. PAUL. I move to suspend the rules and take from the Speaker's table and pass at this time Senate bill No. 1875 for the erection of public buildings at Harrisonburgh and Abingdon, State of Virginia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the United States courts, post-office, and other Government offices at Harrisonburgh, State of Virginia. The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed for the site and building complete the sum of $50,000: Provided, That the site selected shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than forty feet, including streets and alleys; and no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site for the said building shall be vested in the United States; nor until the State of Virginia shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owners thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein. Also, a like sum is hereby appropriated upon the same terms and conditions for a site and public building at Abingdon, Virginia.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand a second on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. BRAGG. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. ATHERTON. Pending the motion to adjourn, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order.

Mr. BRAGG. Is not my motion subject to amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is not, and never was in the history of parliamentary bodies.

The question was taken upon the motion to adjourn; and upon a division there were—ayes 28, noes 58.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. BRAGG called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered, there being but 12 in the affirmative; not one-fifth of a quorum.

Mr. BRAGG. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays, and there were 15 in the affirmative; not one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. BRAGG. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered, their being but 12 in the affirmative; not one-fifth of a quorum.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered and tellers were not ordered, and the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PAUL] to suspend the rules and pass the bill which has been read. Upon this question the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has demanded a second. If there is no objection the second will be considered as ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to that, and ask for a count.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. PAUL and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

Mr. ATHERTON. Would it now be in order to move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Wednesday next?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, pending the motion to suspend the rules.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 127, noes 19.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

Mr. BRAGG rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] as entitled to control the time in opposition to this motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] if he desires to address the House.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLMAN. Ten minutes.

Mr. BRAGG. The purpose of my rising, Mr. Speaker, is simply to obtain some information in regard to this bill. All the information I have yet received upon the subject of the thrift and growth and business of these two large towns at the head of the valley is that pennyroyal and sassafras grow largely in their streets, and there has not been business enough there to keep down their growth so that children can move about without danger of getting lost in the woods. [Laughter.] I desire to know whether this is true or not?

I desire also to inquire something about the population of these towns; whether they are able to sustain and support an ordinary country store there; what are the receipts of the post-office; how many days in a year they hold courts, and the extent and amount of litigation, and what large sums the Government has been paying out in the way of rent, and about how much it will cost for janitors for these two buildings.

This is a bill which, if passed, will give the Forty-seventh Congress the reputation of having in one instance produced twins. [Laughter.] Heretofore the births have been single; but this is a double-barrel concern and has twins in it, and I think we should be well posted about it.

I know that my friend, one of the tellers, says that we should not interfere with this bill because they are such little twins. [Laughter.] I remember to have heard that story offered in excuse once for somebody, I will not say of what sex, accused of having suffered some sort of imposition by reason of which an additional soul was brought into the world. [Laughter.] The excuse was that it weighed only two and one-half pounds, and therefore there should not be any heavy charge made against the party. [Laughter.] Now, I should like to know whether these little twins are to be excused on that principle; whether this is to be passed simply because they are so small; whether there is to be some reasonable excuse given for a bill to provide for the construction of two court-houses in two little country towns. I should like to have some explanation, because I desire to vote understandingly on the subject.

Mr. PAUL. How much time have I?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman having made the motion to suspend the rules is entitled to control the fifteen minutes of debate in favor of the bill.

Mr. PAUL. I shall occupy only ten minutes, and will yield the remaining five to my colleague, [Mr. FULKERSON.] Mr. Speaker, I believe the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] is exceedingly anxious to vote intelligently on this question. He showed that by the opposition of a factious character which he made. I am afraid he showed it by sitting here stock-still, holding the business of this House suspended for half an hour, and refusing to vote to make a quorum.

Mr. BRAGG. I would like to suggest to the gentleman that if I did "sit here stock-still," I did not as a teller leave my place to go out and drum votes.

Mr. PAUL. If I did anything of that sort, sir, I did it with a perfect sense of my duty, and I did not think it a breach of the privileges of the House. Being a new member and not acquainted with the rules, I thought it my duty, in the interest of my constituents, to get as many persons to vote for my bill as I could. If what I did was a breach of the etiquette of this House, I respectfully apologize to this body. At any rate, if I had been here as long as the gentleman from Wisconsin and he had been standing in my shoes, I never would have put upon him the mortification of drawing attention to the fact that he had violated the courtesies of the House.

Mr. BRAGG. Oh, I did not say that.

Mr. PAUL. Now, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, this is no "pennyroyal" bill. I live in as respectable and prosperous a town as any in the gentleman's State. I live in a flourishing town of 4,000 inhabitants; and there is not anywhere in the broad limits of this Union a prettier town or a more energetic, industrious, and sober people.

Let me now call the attention of the House to the merits of this measure. I do not wish to impose upon the House any bill that has not true and genuine merit in it. What is it we ask? We do not come here, as gentlemen have come from other States, with bills asking appropriations of half a million or a quarter of a million or $300,000 or $200,000 or $125,000 for a single court-house. We come in a modest way; we do not ask you to appropriate a large sum for our building. We will be content with a reasonable amount. We will take $50,000 for one court-house and $50,000 for another. Thus the General Government gets two court-houses for less money than you have appropriated here time and again for a single building. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, the most obstinate objector on this floor to these bills for the erection of public buildings has conceded the fact—it was conceded this morning upon the bill of my friend from Mississippi [Mr. MANNING]—that where you have a United States court you ought to have a building in which that court shall hold its sessions.

I speak for my own town, and my remarks will apply substantially to the town of Abingdon, which is in the district of my colleague, [Mr. FULKERSON.] We have in Harrisonburgh a United States circuit and district court. We have an internal-revenue office. Our town is in the center of a district that paid into the Treasury last year through this internal-revenue office, $228,000. Court is held there twice a year for two or three or even four weeks at a time.

The State of Virginia has paid into your Treasury since 1873 $86,000,000; and what have you given her in return for it? Two little court-houses, one at Danville, one at Lynchburgh. Yet when we come here with a modest proposition of this sort, you gentlemen who have been sharing in the payments which Virginia has made into your Treasury get up and talk about "pennyroyal" towns and undertake to belittle a State that has paid more money into the Treasury of the General Government than your own. Virginia stands seventh among all the States in this Union in the payment of revenue; and when she comes here and presents a bill presenting all the requisites that have been demanded by the extremest opponents of these public buildings, does it not look picayunish, to say the least, to try to laugh her out of this House when you have been living and battening and fattening by the labors of her people during the last seventeen years?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have made a plain statement of this question. This bill was favorably reported in the Senate by Mr. MORRILL, who has the reputation of being a cautious, prudent, and economical statesman. After you gentlemen have sat here all this session voting money for public buildings, having appropriated $1,500,000 to erect four public buildings in the State of New York, it would be an act of injustice and ingratitude to refuse to the State of Virginia $100,000 for the erection of two public buildings. All the conditions precedent, all the requirements for a public building are presented here, and there can be no excuse on the part of any member on either side of the House for refusing this act of simple, even-handed justice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's ten minutes have expired.

Mr. BRAGG rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman wish to be heard now?

Mr. BRAGG. I do.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Speaker, all I desire to say, and I say it in real earnest, is, that I think it is high time it should be said to the people of this country that those States which profess to have paid so much money into the public Treasury are not the States from which the money was derived. They do not pay the tax; they are simply the medium through which the taxes are paid, and the tax is collected in every village, in every town, and in every city in the United States. Yet they come here into this House and boast of the amount of money they pay as if they paid the tax, when they themselves pay but a very small tithe of the taxes. The people at large pay the tax, not them.

Now, it is true these two bills simply call for $50,000 each. The experience of this House, the experience of all who have ever examined into that question is, that the $50,000, or $100,000, or $150,000, which the original appropriation made, is not the limit nor the extent of the appropriation. On the contrary, the precedents are uniformly against it.

Persons come into this House with bills, applications are made, grants for the commencement of public buildings are made under the assumption they are to cost but a limited sum of money, members of this House are invited to vote for these bills because they are such small bills, and are so modest; but when that money becomes once invested what is the result? The report made by the architect is there is a deficiency in the completion of the building; one story is only completed; the foundation is only completed; what is to be done? The very same gentlemen who urge now we shall vote for these bills because they are so small and so modest, will then come to the House and say: "What! will you permit the Government to lose that $50,000 when $50,000 more will put it under cover and save what you have already expended? It is useless to waste money, squandering it in this way; give us another $50,000 and we will preserve the first $50,000." [Laughter and applause.]

When they get the building under cover, what then? Then, as was done in the last Congress, $75,000 is asked to finish the approaches to this little modest building! Next they will want from $60,000 to $90,000 to furnish the inside of this little modest building. Then we have to pay a janitor $1,200 to take care of this little building, when the original rent of the building in which the court or post-office was held did not cost as much as the janitor to take care of the new building.

I have often thought when I saw the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds come in and report for such a building, because the Government is paying so much rent and the interest on the principal will be near as much, that never yet has that committee stated the public building will be kept in charge of a janitor at a greater salary than was the rent of the building used by the Government in these small country towns.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Virginia if he is informed how much rent is paid in each of these places?

Mr. PAUL. I am not acquainted with Abingdon. In the town of Harrisonburgh the Government has been paying $500 for a court-house. I know until recently $350 a year is being paid for a revenue office, and $250 I think, for a post-office. I am not sure whether the district attorney pays for his own office or the rent is paid by the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the population of these two towns?

Mr. PAUL. Harrisonburgh has not over 4,000, and Abingdon, I am informed, has about the same. Both are situated in fine fertile districts. My colleague [Mr. FULKERSON] represents the southwest and I represent the valley of Virginia.

Mr. HOLMAN. The rent paid, then, is between $500 and $600 a year.

Mr. PAUL. It is over $1,000 a year at Harrisonburgh alone.

Now, there is another point, Mr. Speaker, which I failed to refer to, and that is the records of the court are now exposed to loss and damage, and I need not dilate upon the serious inconvenience which would result if they were lost or damaged. I yield to my colleague the time remaining.

Mr. FULKERSON. How much time is left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask the question whether it is not regarded as an unusual policy to combine a number of public buildings in one bill? Has that not been disapproved by the action of the House?

Mr. PAUL. I never heard of it. I thought the main question involved was, not the number of buildings to be built, but the amount of money to be appropriated.

Mr. FULKERSON. Mr. Speaker, these bills were introduced separately, but in the bill now pending before the House, coming from the Senate, both buildings have been included in one bill. We are not responsible for that. Abingdon, one of the places mentioned, is a small town of about 3,000 inhabitants.

I am asking for an appropriation for the erection of a building for the use of the United States courts and for the accommodation of the people of nineteen counties representing a population of over 220,000 people. Mr. Speaker, we only ask this sum, and it is a small one which this bill covers, and do not expect hereafter to ask to have it increased. These nineteen counties lie west of the Alleghany Mountains, and form perhaps the richest portion of the State of Virginia. It is a region unsurpassed in mineral wealth, in vast water-power, in fine timber, and is rapidly developing, and the business of that district is greater perhaps than that of any other district in Virginia, except it be the Norfolk district. We have there no building suitable at all for the purposes which this bill contemplates. We have the post-office in an old building entirely unsuitable for it. We have the United States courts held in the garret of the county court-house, and the internal-revenue office is established in another building in all respects unsuitable and inconvenient. All of these buildings together rent for about $1,000 a year, showing the inferiority of the buildings and their unfitness for public purpose, because if they were proper buildings and were adapted to the uses to which they are now applied they would rent for a far greater sum. The records and public papers stored in these buildings are in a very insecure condition, and must necessarily be so from the character of the buildings and their surroundings.

The taxable wealth of my district is $48,000,000. The revenue paid into the Government is $230,000 per annum. The State of Virginia paid last year into the United States Treasury, from the tax on tobacco and whisky alone, over $6,000,000, and as my colleague has just stated, since the year 1873 that State has paid into the Federal Treasury from these sources not less than $85,138,622. Every dollar that Virginia has ever received from the Government since its foundation down to the present time for these purposes has been only $859,961.11. We have already established court-houses at Norfolk, at Richmond, and at Danville; and a bill passed the House a few days ago for the construction of one at Lynchburgh. These are the only public buildings of that kind in the State, and these points named in this bill are the only other points in the State where the United States courts are held. We have made a demand which I think will be conceded to be entirely a reasonable and proper one. We do not ask it as a gratuity, but as a question of right, as something to which the State is entitled; nor do we ask this for a small town, but for a large, wealthy, and populous district. I hope, sir, there will be no objection on the part of the House to performing this small act of justice.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia to suspend the rules and pass the bill which has just been read.

The bill was passed, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof.

PUBLIC BUILDING, POUGHKEEPSIE, NEW YORK.

Mr. KETCHAM. I move, Mr. Speaker, to suspend the rules and take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 1095) to provide for the erection of a public building at Poughkeepsie, New York.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. BRAGG. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to make an inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRAGG. I desire to inquire if it is possible at any time to have the Speaker recognize a motion to adjourn until such time as the list that he has agreed to recognize shall have been proceeded with and completed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the gentleman was himself twice recognized to-day to submit the motion to adjourn.

Mr. BRAGG. No, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SPEAKER. The Chair cannot enter into a colloquy with the gentleman.

Mr. BRAGG. I have no desire to enter into a colloquy.

The SPEAKER. And the Chair has recognized the gentleman from New York to submit a motion.

Mr. BRAGG. But I insist upon my right to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must be heard in order.

Mr. BRAGG. I did not make the statement as broad as the Speaker has stated it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be in order.

Mr. BRAGG. I propose to be heard in order; and I desire to know whether a motion can be received or recognized, or will be received and recognized by the Speaker before such time as the Speaker shall have recognized a motion to suspend the rules, when the motion to adjourn can be interposed——

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already stated that the gentleman has been recognized, and has not been refused recognition to submit such motion.

Mr. BRAGG. I have noticed that the Speaker on several Mondays has denied the motion to adjourn until the bill was read, and then applied the rule that only one motion to adjourn could interpose pending a motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Wisconsin is not making a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BRAGG. But I claim, Mr. Speaker, that this is a denial of the right of every member of this House to make that motion, and I have the right as a member to call the attention of the House to the ruling of the Speaker in such cases, and to ask its correction. Now, I claim the right to know if the House is to be cut off from its right to adjourn until such time as the list is gone through with.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that when the question arises it will be decided. No gentleman proposed to make a motion to adjourn since the Chair recognized the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KETCHAM.]

Mr. BRAGG. I did myself.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin now move to adjourn?

Mr. BRAGG. No, sir. I made the motion, but the Speaker's eye went yonder.

A MEMBER. The Speaker has the right of recognition.

Mr. BRAGG. He has that right; but I have a right also to state what are my rights here as much as the Speaker has the right to violate the spirit of the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can have his remedy when the question arises.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to say a word upon this. It is well understood under the rules the Chair has the right of recognition. That has been the invariable practice; and I know of no right which the gentleman from Wisconsin enjoys to be recognized for any purpose over any other gentleman, until that purpose has been communicated to the Chair. And if the Chair, in the exercise of his discretion, recognizes a gentleman to make a motion to suspend the rules, the Chair must then deal with the motion to adjourn as it presents itself under the rules.

Mr. BRAGG. I thank the gentleman from West Virginia for his suggestion. I do not claim any privilege that other gentlemen are not entitled to have. The motion to adjourn is a question of privilege. [Cries of "Regular order!"] And it is to that question of privilege I rise. [The Speaker rapped to order.] And what I complain of is, that, in violation of my privilege, the motion to adjourn is declared not to be in order, the Chair looking the other way, and thereby a privileged motion is not in order until it is too late.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin it is not in order to proceed to debate a matter that is not before the House. The Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. BRAGG. I rose to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has stated his question, and it has been disposed of. The Clerk will read the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to purchase a suitable site, and cause to be erected thereon, at Poughkeepsie, in the State of New York, a substantial and commodious public building, with fire-proof vaults, for the use and accommodation of the post-office and internal-revenue offices, and for other Government uses. The site, and the building thereon, when completed according to plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed the cost of $75,000; and the site purchased shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of at least fifty feet, including streets and alleys: and for the purposes herein mentioned the sum of $75,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until a valid title to the said site shall be vested in the United States, and the State of New York shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owners thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of any civil process therein.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PEIRCE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 216) authorizing the Secretary of War to supply artillery and camp equipage to the encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic at Bismarck Grove, in Douglas County, Kansas; and

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 247) to provide for the printing of public documents, for binding, and distribution to those entitled to receive them.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 121) to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across the Sainte Marie River;

A bill (S. No. 1825) making appropriation for the purpose of macadamizing a road from the city of New Albany, in the State of Indiana, to the national cemetery, near said city;

A bill (S. No. 2033) to authorize the sale of certain lots in the city of Hot Springs, Arkansas, to the Woman's Christian National Library Association;

A bill (S. No. 2034) to authorize the Secretary of War to deliver certain cannon for monumental purposes to the Grand Army of the Republic at Westminster, Massachusetts; also to the Danville Light Battery A, Illinois National Guard, at Danville, Illinois, for monumental purposes;

A bill (S. No. 2068) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the Jeff. C. Davis Post No. 16 of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Vincennes, Indiana, six condemned cast-iron guns, for monumental purposes; and

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 249) amending a paragraph in the act for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department, approved May 1, 1882, and to correct an error in the enrollment thereof.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT POUGHKEEPSIE, NEW YORK.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. KETCHAM] to suspend the rules and pass the bill which has been read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KETCHAM.]

Before the result of the vote by tellers was announced,

Mr. HOLMAN said: It is suggested that unanimous consent be given that the gentleman from New York shall move to suspend the rules and pass the bill with an amendment reducing the limit of expenditure to $65,000 instead of $75,000.

Mr. KETCHAM. I agree to that proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. KETCHAM] asks unanimous consent to modify his motion and to pass the Senate bill amended by reducing the amount of expenditure from $75,000 to $65,000. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the bill, amended as indicated, was passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SHREVEPORT.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 750) providing for the erection of a public building at Shreveport, Louisiana, and to pass the same.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] is recognized for a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. HISCOCK. Pending the motion to adjourn, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana moves to suspend the rules, take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 750) to provide for the construction of a public building at the city of Shreveport, State of Louisiana, and pass the same.

Mr. RYAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. ELLIS. I hope the motion to adjourn will be withdrawn. There have been three or four recognitions on that side of the House for bills of this character. This bill has passed the Senate, and I ask the House now to pass it.

The SPEAKER. If the motion to adjourn be insisted upon, the Chair will put it.

Mr. HISCOCK. Does the Chair understand that pending the motion to adjourn I moved that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Wednesday next?

Mr. KENNA. I make the point of order that that motion is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion is not now in order.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I insist that pending a motion to adjourn a motion to fix the time to which the House shall adjourn is in order, and expressly so under the rule, and that the motion to fix the time to which the House shall adjourn takes precedence. There is a difference in that respect between the rule in the Senate and the rule in the House. I ask the Chair to refer to the rule and have it read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair remembers the rule very well, and the gentleman states it quite accurately as a general rule; but the rule that applies when a motion to suspend the rules is pending is a rule that admits of only a motion to adjourn.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I admit that; I did not know the Chair was entertaining the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has entertained the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then the Chair and I do not disagree at all.

Mr. RYAN. I will withdraw the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill called up by the gentleman from Louisiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase a site for, and cause to be erected, a suitable building of bricks or stone, with fire-proof vaults, for the accommodation of the post-office, United States courts, internal-revenue, Signal Service, customs, and other Government officers at the city of Shreveport, State of Louisiana; and that for this purpose there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall, upon the passage of this act, cause the proper plans and specifications to be made, so that no expenditure shall be made or authorized for the purchase of a site and the full completion of said building beyond the sum herein appropriated upon the plans to be previously approved by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be expended until a valid title to the site of said building, which site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of at least fifty feet, including streets and alleys, shall be vested in the United States, and until the State of Louisiana shall duly relinquish and release its jurisdiction over the same, and its right to tax said site and the property thereon belonging to the United States.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill which has just been read.

Mr. WHITE. On that motion I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the second will be considered as ordered.

Mr. BRAGG. I object.

Mr. WHITE. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] will withdraw his objection. I desire to have some explanation of this bill.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. KENNA. Is that in order?

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Would it be in order now to move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Wednesday next?

The SPEAKER. Not pending the motion to suspend the rules.

The question was taken upon the motion to adjourn; and upon a division there were—ayes 36, noes 61.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. BRAGG called for tellers.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the Chair now entertain a motion to adjourn over until Wednesday next?

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules is pending.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I desire to inquire if by unanimous consent a motion could now be entertained and voted upon that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Wednesday next?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Then I make that request.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I object.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. My point is this: in the attitude in which the House is now placed, a motion to adjourn having been made under the rules, (and the Chair seems to be clearly right that that is the only motion in order pending the motion to suspend the rules,) it is not in order to move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn over until Wednesday next.

Now, if no one can be recognized by the Chair prior to the introduction of a motion to suspend the rules and pass a bill, it will be impossible for the House to try the question of adjourning over. I wish to submit the inquiry to the Chair, and see if he can contrive some way in which the House can be permitted to test that question, some way that a motion to adjourn over will be in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there is no very great difficulty in the mind of the Chair about "contriving" a way to let that motion be made; but it cannot be done, under the rules, pending a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I quite agree with the Chair in that, but I would like to get an opportunity to submit that motion.

The SPEAKER. If it be the judgment of the House, the Chair will try to ascertain that. After the pending motion to suspend the rules shall have been disposed of, the Chair will recognize some gentleman to make that motion.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I would like an opportunity to make it myself, if no other gentleman makes it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suggest to the gentleman who is now moving to suspend the rules that he withdraw that motion so that I may make the motion to adjourn over.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Upon this condition——

The SPEAKER. There is pending now a motion to adjourn, upon which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] has demanded tellers.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask unanimous consent, by way of solving this difficulty, that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] be allowed to withdraw his motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill which has been read, in order that a motion may be made to adjourn over until Wednesday; and that it shall be unanimously agreed that the gentleman from Louisiana shall not lose the advantage he now has in the pending status of the bill, but that it shall come up as unfinished business upon a motion to suspend the rules, just as it now stands.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. When?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Whenever the business is again reached.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] asks consent that this bill go over until Wednesday next as unfinished business.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. No; as unfinished business when in order.

Mr. BLACKBURN. When will that be?

The SPEAKER. If the House should now adjourn it will necessarily come up as unfinished business.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then I will put my request in this shape: that the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana be now withdrawn by unanimous consent, in order that the motion to adjourn over until Wednesday be made and adopted, or disposed of in some way; with the agreement that when the House meets on Wednesday the bill of the gentleman shall be considered as unfinished business, as it now is.

The SPEAKER. That is the way the Chair understood the gentleman before.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Well, I make that proposition now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] asks unanimous consent that this bill may go over and come up as unfinished business on Wednesday next, on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. HISCOCK. I can see no objection to this arrangement: that after the motion to adjourn until Wednesday has been made and passed upon, then the Speaker, if he desires to do so, can recognize the gentleman from Louisiana to submit his motion and suspend the rules and pass this bill; the result will only be that this motion will be postponed for a time. That is the attitude I desire to leave him in; that he be again recognized to submit his motion, after the motion to adjourn over has been acted upon.

The SPEAKER. The appeal must be made to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is all agreed.

ADJOURNMENT TILL WEDNESDAY.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn until Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] withdraw his motion for that purpose?

Mr. BLANCHARD. With that understanding I do.

Mr. HISCOCK. With the understanding simply that he is to be recognized after this motion is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. HISCOCK,] with the consent of the gentleman from Louisiana, who withdraws his motion for that purpose only, moves that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 81, noes 34.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, and Mr. HISCOCK were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 102, noes 25.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I do not press the point that no quorum has voted.

So the motion of Mr. HISCOCK was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING, SHREVEPORT, LOUISIANA.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I now renew my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana moves to suspend the rules, to take from the Speaker's table and pass the bill (S. No. 750) to provide for the erection of a public building at the city of Shreveport, State of Louisiana.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. What has become of the motion to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. It was disposed of by unanimous consent.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. By unanimous consent the gentleman from Louisiana was permitted simply to withdraw his bill until the motion to adjourn over until Wednesday had been voted upon.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn may be regarded as pending.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. On that motion the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] had demanded tellers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the motion to adjourn.

FEES AND MILEAGE OF WITNESSES.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table, for concurrence in the amendments of the Senate, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 243) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for fees of witnesses in the United States courts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882. The exigency of the case is my reason for making this request.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

Strike out "sixty," in line 1, and insert "seventy."

At the end of line 7 add:

"Provided, That all persons residing west of the Mississippi River, excepting those who are entitled by law to a higher compensation, who have been or are in attendance at Washington, District of Columbia, under subpœna as witnesses in any of the courts of such District in any of the cases known as 'star-route prosecutions,' shall be entitled to receive a total per diem of $2.50, and mileage to and from their places of residence by the usual route of travel at the rate of seven cents per mile."

Mr. HISCOCK. Allow me in a single word to explain. The amendment of the Senate provides that witnesses who have been subpœnaed here from beyond the Mississippi upon the star-route trials now going on shall be paid seven cents per mile going and coming. Under the present law they would receive only five cents. It is represented, and I believe it is true, that five cents a mile each way would not cover the actual traveling expenses of these witnesses. The amendment of the Senate further provides that these witnesses while here may be paid a per diem of $2.50, the present law allowing $1.50. We all understand that $2.50 a day is doubtless necessary for their support while here.

There being no objection, the amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. HISCOCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HISCOCK, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Appropriations, as a substitute for House bill No. 6675, a bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve all points of order on this bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HISCOCK. I give notice that I shall ask the House to consider this bill immediately upon the conclusion of the consideration the naval appropriation bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If a motion to adjourn should now be made and should prevail, will the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] come up on Wednesday next as unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. It will not unless that day should be within the last six days of the session; but it will come up as soon as motions to suspend the rules are in order.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I asked unanimous consent that the gentleman from Louisiana might withdraw his motion in order that the motion to adjourn over until Wednesday might be made, with the understanding that when the motion to suspend the rules should be renewed by the gentleman it should go over till Wednesday as unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the question to the House.

Mr. HISCOCK. That was the proposition which was made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN.] I then asked the gentleman to forbear making his motion and I would call up the joint resolution which has been disposed of and he could then be recognized again and his rights would be the same they were.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am sure no gentleman wanted to take any advantage; I know the confusion which was reigning at the time, and I am satisfied no gentleman will seek to take any now.

I am frank and candid in the statement that I advised my friend from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] to withdraw his motion in order that the motion might be made and voted on to adjourn over until Wednesday, with the understanding, by unanimous consent, his motion was to stand as unfinished business when the House should meet on Wednesday. If I was in error it was my own error, as I thought unanimous consent had been given to it and so advised him. I now ask through the Chair that it shall be so considered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the motion to suspend the rules of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] coming up as unfinished business on Wednesday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HISCOCK. I object, because there is no doubt the gentleman will have a chance to get this bill before the House——

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the gentleman will hear me a moment I am sure he will not object, no matter whether it was the gentleman from New York or not——

Mr. HISCOCK. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

PARIS MONETARY CONFERENCE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

In answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 25th of April last, calling for information in regard to the reassembling of the Paris monetary conference during the current year, and other matters connected therewith, I transmit herewith a report on the subject and its accompanying papers.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

To Mr. JACOBS, for one day, on account of illness.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina, for three days.

JAMES RYBACK.

On motion of Mr. McLANE, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House the papers of James Ryback, there being no adverse report.

And then, on motion of Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan, (at six o'clock and two minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned until Wednesday next.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 5, 1882.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Monday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FRYE. I present a memorial of the Bath Board of Trade, State of Maine, which indorses by resolution a petition for a commission to consider the mercantile marine and its necessities. I do not know where to send this paper. There is no committee of Congress of either House that takes the slightest interest in the commercial marine of the United States. There is no head of a Department that has jurisdiction over the subject. It is an orphan, really, without any orphan's court or guardian. It is a waif without any home. It is a tramp to whom nobody is obliged to give cold victuals even. I present the memorial, but what to do with it I do not know.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRYE. The Committee on Commerce is entirely taken up with the consideration of the river and harbor bill, I believe, in both Houses at this time.

Mr. GARLAND. To what subject does the memorial relate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To the commercial marine.

Mr. FRYE. That there should be a commission established is beyond question, and the time is coming when Congress will find itself compelled absolutely to take this matter into consideration and do something with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests that it would be proper to send the memorial to the Committee on Finance. They can determine what ought to be done with it. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FERRY presented the petition of William H. Pullen and others, citizens of Fowlerville, Michigan, praying for the passage of a bill increasing pensions to one-armed and one-legged soldiers to $40 per month; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of D. H. McComas and other one-armed and one-legged soldiers of Michigan, praying for the passage of a bill granting increase of pensions to such persons; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SEWELL presented a petition of citizens of New Jersey, praying for the passage of an act to prevent the taking of menhaden and other fish with purse-nets and by steam-vessels within two miles of the coast; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented a petition of citizens of Erie County, Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of a bill to prevent the infringement of patents; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT DALLAS.

Mr. VEST. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6394) for the erection of a public building at Dallas, Texas, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HOAR. How does that bill come up?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. VEST. It is a House bill for the erection of a public building at Dallas, Texas.

Mr. HOAR. How many inhabitants are there going to be there?

Mr. VEST. There are 20,000 inhabitants there now and the probability is that there will soon be 100,000.

Mr. INGALLS. Are the United States courts held at Dallas?

Mr. COKE. There is a United States court held there. They need a post-office and they need a court-house. It is a city already of about 20,000 inhabitants, and is the most rapidly growing city in Texas, located in the wealthiest and most densely populated portion of the State.

Mr. INGALLS. How many public buildings are there in Texas now?

Mr. COKE. I do not think there are over two, one at Austin and one at Galveston.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I am directed by the Committee on Claims to submit an adverse report on the bill (S. No. 290) for the relief of John Taylor.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that be placed on the Calendar until I can have an opportunity to see the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee, which will be printed under the rule.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1907) for the relief of John Jett, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred a letter from the Acting Secretary of State to the acting chairman of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, relative to moneys in the custody of the Secretary of State, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; which was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1931) for the relief of Agnes W. and Sarah J. Hills, reported it with an amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SLATER. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2627) for the relief of Ann Stuchell, to report it adversely. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. SLATER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1750) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Ann W. Mulvey, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SLATER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1694) granting an increase of pension to Grace F. Edes, to report it adversely. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1688) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Henry H. Bingham the compensation allowed to disbursing agents for public buildings, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1987) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue to George K. Otis duplicates of certain land warrants lost while in the possession of the officers of the Government, reported it with an amendment.

HUMPHREY H. LEMON.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I am instructed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to report back favorably, without amendment, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 112) authorizing the appointment of Humphrey H. Lemon upon the Capitol police force; and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It proposes to direct the Board of Capitol Police to place upon the roll of the Capitol police, as an additional member, Humphrey H. Lemon, formerly belonging to the force, who was maimed for life while in the discharge of his duties; and when appointed under the authority of the resolution, Lemon is to be assigned to the duty now performed by him as a watchman in the Dome of the Capitol.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONDEMNED CANNON FOR MONUMENTAL PURPOSES.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the bill (H. R. No. 6419) granting four condemned cannon to Otis Chapman Post No. 103 of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Chicopee, Massachusetts, and the bill (S. No. 2096) to authorize the Secretary of War to turn over to George H. Thomas Post No. 18 of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Ottawa, Kansas, four condemned cannon, to report them favorably without amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri ask for the present consideration of these bills?

Mr. PLUMB. I was going to suggest to the Senator from Missouri that he ask for the immediate consideration of the bills.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to their present consideration. It has been usual to consider such bills when reported. They are both in the usual form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, the bills will be considered in the order in which they were reported.

By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 6419) granting four condemned cannon to Otis Chapman Post No. 103 of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Chicopee, Massachusetts, for monumental purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 2096) to authorize the Secretary of War to turn over to George H. Thomas Post No. 18 of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Ottawa, Kansas, four condemned cannon, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2120) to amend title 33 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2121) for the relief of Terrence Delozier; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 88) authorizing the appointment and retirement of Samuel Kramer a chaplain in the Navy of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL (by request) asked and, by unanimous consentt obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2122) for the relief of Frances A. Robinson, administratrix of the estate of John M. Robinson; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on file in the case, referred to the Committee on Claims.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 243) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for fees of witnesses in the United States courts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 750) to provide for the construction of a public building at the city of Shreveport, State of Louisiana.

BEN HOLLADAY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further routine morning business the morning hour is closed.

Mr. COCKRELL. The regular order.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Before proceeding to the consideration of the Calendar under the Anthony rule, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill for the relief of Ben Holladay.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin can, by the vote of a majority of the Senate, have the bill taken up. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1683) for the relief of Ben Holladay. That bill has been reached on the Calendar.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope that at this late hour in the session we shall not take up a bill that will evidently consume several days. This is an old matter, and I hope it will not be taken up now when we have so much other business that seems to demand a higher regard.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me that the failure to act upon the bill is as much a disgrace to this Government as if it should repudiate its bonds. It is suggested one day that there is not time, and another day when it was proposed, a week ago, there was some other reason urged why the bill should not be considered. Whether the claim be honest or not, it ought to be met and understood and disposed of once for all.

Mr. INGALLS. This claim is old because Congress has with persistent and conspicuous injustice refused to consider it. It has been often debated before the Senate, and the facts are familiar probably to every Senator who hears me. I unite with the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Massachusetts in expressing the hope that this long delayed matter of justice may at last be taken up and acted on.

Mr. PLUMB. What my colleague has said is partly true, and perhaps it may be entirely true in one aspect of the case; but I call attention to the fact that for a number of years this case was not presented to Congress at all; that for at least ten years it was allowed to remain and sleep. I am not saying it ought not to be decided, but I desire to say that there are a number of measures of public importance on the Calendar which ought to be acted upon. If such measures are to be made special, I want to give notice now that I shall antagonize this bill with the House bill reported from the Committee on Agriculture for the extension of the powers of the Department of Agriculture. I shall have the chance, I hope, of testing the sense of the Senate as to whether a claim of this kind, which has waited so long at the option of the claimant himself, shall be taken up to the displacement of matters of great public importance.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to state to him that this claim accrued in 1862, 1864, and 1865, and was presented by the claimant on the 26th of January, 1866?

Mr. PLUMB. It was rejected by Congress simultaneously at about the next session of Congress, and was not brought up until about ten years afterward.

Mr. HOAR. It was not rejected; it passed both branches in the year 1866, and fell through by reason of the failure of the conference committee to arrange the differences between the two branches.

Mr. PLUMB. That shows that notwithstanding the familiarity which the Senator from Massachusetts ought to have with this claim, he is misinformed.

Mr. HOAR. I have looked at the record within three weeks.

Mr. PLUMB. I will submit the matter to the record myself.

Mr. MORRILL. The claim that fell through was a very different one from this.

Mr. PLUMB. I was about to say that.

Mr. MORRILL. It was merely to allow for articles taken by the military authorities.

Mr. PLUMB. Amounting to about 10 per cent. of the entire claim. So that Congress has practically rejected the entire claim after consideration in the conference committee, and it was about ten years or more before it was ever presented again. I am not saying that that is conclusive against the claim. I am perfectly willing to discuss the claim upon its merits when it comes before Congress; but I insist that at this late hour of the session, with matters of public importance pressing upon us, in the interest of public business this bill should not be taken up under the whip and spur of a delayed and belated adjournment.

Mr. VOORHEES. This bill has been more thoroughly considered, it seems to me, than any claim I ever knew before Congress. When we had this matter before us in the last Congress it was conceded, and conceded conspicuously and for a purpose, by those on the floor who were unfriendly to the bill, that a large sum of money was due to Mr. Holladay. It was thought to be just to him that that concession should be made by those who had been most conspicuous in opposing the payment of the claim at that time. Since then the matter has again been thoroughly investigated and is now again reported upon. It was very fully debated when it was considered by the Senate before, and I do not believe it can under any circumstances lead to extensive discussion now.

I hope that in the interest of long-delayed justice this bill may be taken up and passed in some shape, for it is conceded on all hands that there is money due to this man, and for my part I am anxious that he shall be paid.

Mr. PLUMB. Is the motion subject to amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. PLUMB. Is it in order to move a substitute for the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; it will be necessary to vote definitely on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin to take up the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. FERRY. Before I vote on the question I wish to inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin whether he intends to take up more time than until two o'clock each day on the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Its consideration cannot extend beyond two o'clock.

Mr. FERRY. Not unless the Senator from Wisconsin moves to continue the consideration of the bill. I suppose the unfinished business could be displaced by a majority of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That would be for the Senate to decide.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is unfinished business after two o'clock.

Mr. FERRY. I have a bill which I desire to bring up.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I do not think that the discussion of this bill can possibly occupy more than two or three hours. Those who favor the bill are perfectly willing, in order to save time, to let it stand upon the report of the committee, and they will not enter into any extensive discussion of the bill. I do not intend myself to say anything in support of the bill unless it be necessary to say something to correct the egregious errors which I fear some of those who oppose the bill may possibly fall into.

Mr. PLUMB. Before the motion is put I desire to make a suggestion for the benefit of my friend from Wisconsin, and also for the benefit of the Treasury, of which he is a guardian as a member of the Committee on Claims. The bill as it was reported before made an appropriation of about $400,000.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. PLUMB. That makes it better still. The bill went back to the committee, and the committee reduced it about $200,000. I think, on the whole, if it should go back again the committee would be able to do as well the next time, and thus earn fully as much as they are liable to earn in any other way. I think for that reason, for the benefit of the Treasury, the claim ought to be postponed.

I wish to say further, that when the case comes up I by an unfortunate circumstance shall perhaps be led to some extent to take a leading part in opposition to the bill. I have not had time (which is perhaps my own fault) to examine the report now made. It embraces calculations in regard to values, accounts, &c., which require a great deal of care, and I shall ask that the bill may not receive final consideration to-day, so that I may have time to go over those accounts again, because if we pay this person I desire to guard the Treasury with reference to the claims of more than 1,000 men who are similarly situated in the United States, who carried the mails upon star-route lines, that the basis of the compensation to be paid to this person may be fixed in some authentic way, in order that the precedent which is set shall not lead to a very large depletion of the Treasury.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. President, I have left this matter mainly with the committee to examine this subject and see what this man was entitled to receive. I did have some knowledge of the subject at the time the work was performed; I was then in the West myself and knew this man, and knew a great deal about what was going on. I will say that at the time he was working, and when the losses occurred, I did not know of any man who was working for the public who was receiving greater sympathy from the people and expressions of the people than he. At the time I met him there was but one sentiment and one expression, and that was in favor of his getting what they called his rights. I have followed the matter in general from that time to this, and I believe he is entitled to something. I take it that the committee has fixed upon about the true amount. I do hope the matter will be settled now. I am in favor of giving something for the great losses that he sustained.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. Did not the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] move to lay the motion on the table?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No, sir.

Mr. HARRIS. I understood him so to move.

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, I made such a motion.

Mr. HARRIS. I simply wanted to suggest that the motion is not debatable, and I shall raise the objection from this time on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not hear the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin moves to take up Senate bill No. 1683 in preference to proceeding to the consideration of bills on the Calendar under the Anthony rule. There is a motion pending to lay that motion on the table, and it is not debatable. The Chair was not aware of the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BUTLER. I know a motion to lay on the table is not debatable, but I simply desire to say that I have more than twice given notice of——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That the Chair thinks is debating the motion by telling the Senate that the Senator wishes to consider something else. If that is not debating it, the Chair does not know what is.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to give notice, then, that I shall ask to take up the bill to form a government for the Territory of Alaska. I have endeavored again and again to call the attention of the Senate to that matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending a motion to lay on the table, nothing is in order; it is not even in order to give a notice.

Mr. MORGAN. If I understand the situation of this bill it is now before the Senate really under the Anthony rule, because the bill was passed over without prejudice.

Mr. COCKRELL. No, it was passed over on objection.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator from Alabama is mistaken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is a motion to take up the bill outside of the Anthony rule.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I was entirely mistaken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to lay the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] on the table.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those who are in favor of laying the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin on the table will vote "yea," and if that motion prevails it carries with it the bill for the time being.

Mr. HOAR. I beg the Chair's pardon; it does not carry with it the bill; the bill remains at its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill does not lose its place on the Calendar. The Chair probably was misunderstood. He meant to say that it carries with it the bill for to-day, if the motion to lay on the table prevails. The bill does not lose its place on the Calendar, but the Senate cannot go on and consider it to-day. The Chair probably was not choice in his phraseology, but supposed that he was understood.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted--yeas 23, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—23.

Bayard,	Coke,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Brown,	Davis of Illinois,	McMillan,	Saulsbury,
Butler,	Davis of W. Va.,	Maxey,	Slater,
Call,	Gorman,	Morrill,	Vest,
Camden,	Harris,	Plumb,	Walker.
Cockrell,	Johnston,	Pugh,

NAYS—29.

Allison,	Ferry,	Jones of Nevada,	Sewell,
Anthony,	Frye,	Kellogg,	Sherman,
Blair,	Garland,	Miller of Cal.,	Vance,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hawley,	Morgan,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hoar,	Platt,	Windom.
Chilcott,	Ingalls,	Rollins,

Dawes,	Jones of Florida,	Sawyer,

ABSENT—24.

Aldrich,	Groome,	Hill of Georgia,	Mahone,

Edmunds,	Hale,	Lapham,	Mitchell,
Fair,	Hampton,	Logan,	Pendleton,
Farley,	Harrison,	McDill,	Van Wyck,
George,	Hill of Colorado,	McPherson,	Williams.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to the consideration of this bill, but it is well known that it will take some time to consider it. It always has taken considerable time in its consideration. I wish to suggest to the friends of the bill, in view of the fact that it will be impossible to take action on it at this session, that they fix some day when it shall be taken up and considered at the next session, the first day of the next session or any other early time, and let it be the regular order and disposed of then. If it is taken up now it simply stops the consideration of all further business on the Calendar. That is the reason I am opposed to its being taken up at this late hour of the session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin to proceed to the consideration of the bill for the relief of Ben Holladay.

Mr. PLUMB and others called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSTON, (when his name was called.) I voted on the last vote, forgetting that I was paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MITCHELL.] I am paired with him on this vote.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 31, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—31.

Allison,	Ferry,	Ingalls,	Rollins,
Anthony,	Frye,	Jackson,	Saunders,
Blair,	Garland,	Jones of Florida,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hale,	Jones of Nevada,	Sewell,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	Kellogg,	Sherman,
Chilcott,	Hawley,	Miller of Cal.,	Voorhees,
Conger,	Hill of Colorado,	Morgan,	Windom.
Dawes,	Hoar,	Platt,

NAYS—24.

Bayard,	Cockrell,	Harris,	Pugh,
Beck,	Coke,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Davis of Illinois,	McMillan,	Slater,
Butler,	Davis of W. Va.,	Maxey,	Vance,
Call,	Farley,	Morrill,	Vest,
Camden,	Gorman,	Plumb,	Walker.

ABSENT—21.

Aldrich,	Hampton,	McDill,	Ransom.
Edmunds	Hill of Georgia,	McPherson,	Van Wyck,
Fair,	Johnston,	Mahone,	Williams.
George,	Lamar,	Miller of N. Y.,
Groome,	Lapham,	Mitchell,
Grover,	Logan,	Pendleton,

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1683) for the relief of Ben Holladay.

Mr. PLUMB. I now move to postpone the further consideration of this bill in order to take up House bill No. 4429, and in order that I may not be accused of filibustering, I simply want to say that before this bill is considered I wish to get the data in the first place to disclose the error of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] in his statement that this claim was favorably considered by Congress, and in the next place matter used in a former debate which I thought I had at my desk but do not find——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion as made is not in order. A motion to postpone to a day certain would be in order.

Mr. HOAR. I said a bill for relief had passed both branches of Congress and had been submitted to a committee of conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion to postpone to a day certain is in order.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to postpone this bill until Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the motion is carried, the Senator can then move to take up another bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to postpone the further consideration of this bill until next Monday in order to take up the bill (H. R. No. 4429) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motions cannot be coupled.

Mr. PLUMB. I can add that by way of explanation——

Mr. HARRIS. I move to postpone until the first Monday in December next.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope my friend from Tennessee will withdraw his motion, as I rise to move, because I think full opportunity should be given for the consideration of this case at the very earliest practicable time, and it is now very near the close of the session——

Mr. INGALLS. How near?

Mr. COCKRELL. Probably within two or three weeks at most, and the taking up of this bill interferes materially with the consideration of the cases on the Calendar to which there is no objection. I can see no reason why the friends of this bill should not fix a day when it can be the order and be disposed of regardless of all objection. Therefore I move that the case be set for two o'clock on the second Monday in December next. That will be immediately after the assembling of Congress, after the committees have been organized. Then it can be taken up and disposed of, and there will be no objection to its disposition. I hope that the friends of this bill will agree to this motion.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senate has determined to take it up now, at this time.

Mr. INGALLS. I would ask the Senator from Missouri if he did not make that same motion two years ago?

Mr. COCKRELL. I did just at the heel of the session, the favorite time when this bill is pressed—the very last day I believe it was of the session.

Mr. HARRIS. I withdraw the motion I made, and shall vote for the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. It was I who moved to postpone it till the next session then, and it was taken up and disposed of at that session. It can be done precisely in the same way now. I propose the first possible time that the Senate will have a chance to consider it, and that is the second Monday in December at two o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The longest time will be put first.

Mr. HOAR. Is the motion in order?

Mr. HARRIS. I withdraw the motion I made in favor of the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to postpone——

Mr. HOAR. It is not to postpone to a day certain, but to fix an hour for the consideration of the bill, which is not one of the motions enumerated in the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That portion of the motion is not in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I withdraw the particular hour, and move to postpone to that day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion to postpone to a day certain is in order, though the hour named might not be.

Mr. COCKRELL. I withdraw that part of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is that the Senate postpone to the second Monday in December next this bill.

Mr. HOAR. That motion, of course, is practically an indefinite postponement. Everything which comes in before this under the rules of the Senate takes precedence. The motion is to postpone to a fixed day——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri was right. The Senate can fix an hour at which a bill shall be considered.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will then put it at one o'clock on that day.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair have the rule read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "Any subject or matter may, by a vote of two-thirds of the Senators present, be made a special order; and when the hour fixed for the consideration of a special order shall arrive"——

Mr. HOAR. What rule is that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Rule 10. It continues: "it shall be the duty of the Presiding Officer to lay such special order before the Senate."

Mr. COCKRELL. I made the motion to postpone until the second Monday in December.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And to make it a special order for that day?

Mr. COCKRELL. No, sir. It will then come up and be the special order. Now, I say that it is not a final disposition or rejection of this claim. The Senator from Massachusetts would leave the impression that if it is postponed till that time it cannot then be considered. The Senator from Massachusetts knows that when this bill was up at the close of the first session of the Forty-sixth Congress, it was postponed until the beginning of the next session, and was taken up in January and acted upon and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing to the second Monday of December next.

Mr. PLUMB. What became of my motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This supersedes it. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when Mr. HAMPTON'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. HAMPTON] is paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] on this question.

Mr. JACKSON, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMPTON.] If he were here, I should vote against postponement.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 24, nays 29, as follows:

YEAS—24.

Bayard,	Cockrell,	Harris,	Pugh,
Beck,	Coke,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Davis of Illinois,	Maxey,	Slater,
Butler,	Davis of W. Va.,	Morgan,	Vance,
Call,	Farley,	Morrill,	Vest,
Camden,	Gorman,	Plumb,	Walker.

NAYS—29.

Allison,	Ferry,	Jones of Florida,	Sherman,
Anthony,	Frye,	Jones of Nevada,	Van Wyck,
Blair,	Garland,	Lapham,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hale,	Miller of Cal.,	Williams,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Platt,	Windom.
Chilcott,	Hill of Colorado,	Rollins,
Conger,	Hoar,	Saunders,
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Sawyer,

ABSENT—23.

Aldrich,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Miller of N. Y.,
Edmunds,	Harrison,	Logan,	Mitchell,
Fair,	Hill of Georgia	McDill,	Pendleton,
George,	Jackson,	McMillan,	Ransom,
Groome,	Johnston,	McPherson,	Sewell.
Grover,	Kellogg,	Mahone,

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to postpone the bill until Monday next.

Mr. PLUMB called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when Mr. HAMPTON's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. HAMPTON] is paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] on this question.

Mr. JACKSON, (when his name was called.) I would vote "nay," but for my pair with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMPTON.]

Mr. JOHNSTON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MITCHELL.]

Mr. SEWELL, (when his name was called.) My attention has been called to the fact that my colleague [Mr. MCPHERSON] is absent, and I now announce my pair with him.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 24, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Bayard,	Cockrell,	Harris,	Ransom,
Beck,	Coke,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Davis of Illinois,	Maxey,	Slater,
Butler,	Davis of W. Va.,	Morrill,	Vance,
Call,	Farley,	Plumb,	Vest,
Camden,	Gorman,	Pugh,	Walker.

NAYS—30.

Allison,	Ferry,	Jones of Nevada,	Sawyer,
Anthony,	Frye,	Kellogg,	Sherman,
Blair,	Garland,	Lapham,	Van Wyck,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hale,	Miller of Cal.,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Morgan,	Williams,
Chilcott,	Hill of Colorado,	Platt,	Windom.
Conger,	Hoar,	Rollins,
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Saunders,

ABSENT—22.

Aldrich,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Miller of N. Y.,
Edmunds,	Harrison,	Logan,	Mitchell,
Fair,	Hill of Georgia,	McDill,	Pendleton,
George,	Jackson,	McMillan,	Sewell.
Groome,	Johnston,	McPherson,
Grover,	Jones of Florida,	Mahone,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that this bill be postponed till Tuesday next, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1153.

Mr. INGALLS. That is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion can be made to postpone the bill to another day.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not understand the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina can move to postpone to a day other than the days which have been voted on; but he cannot couple with it the purpose for which he does it or what bill he intends to move afterward.

Mr. HARRIS. That is no part of the motion.

Mr. BUTLER. I simply proposed to give notice of my purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Notice can be given.

Mr. BUTLER. I move, then, to postpone the bill until Friday next, and if that motion succeeds I give notice that I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1153) providing for the organization of the district of Southeastern Alaska, and providing for a civil government therefor.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, is this motion debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is debatable, except upon the merits of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the motion will be withdrawn. I understand that the honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] who has given great attention to this subject, has a speech all ready in opposition to the bill, an admirable speech. The documents are on his table now.

Mr. MORRILL. I prefer to speak for myself rather than have the Senator from Massachusetts speak for me. I say that if the question does go on, I have all the documents that I want except one. I have not been able to procure the original petition, but I shall be able to show that the Senate put their foot upon this claim when it was first brought here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is not in order.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senator from South Carolina will let our friend from Vermont make his speech.

Mr. BUTLER. I am much obliged to the Senator from Massachusetts for his suggestion, but I shall insist upon my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina moves to postpone the consideration of the bill until Friday next.

Mr. BUTLER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I desire to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether or not it is probable that an appropriation bill will be ready for consideration on Friday next? I understand the river and harbor bill will be reported to-day, and if there is no other appropriation bill ready that will probably be considered to-morrow, and it cannot be completed to-morrow, and its consideration will go on during Friday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Friday next.

The Acting Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when Mr. HAMPTON's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. HAMPTON] is paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. JACKSON.]

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope that the Senator from Wisconsin will not insist on having this case heard this morning.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senate has agreed to my motion; I have nothing further to do with it. The Senate have determined to take up the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I move that it be postponed until next Tuesday.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, it is obvious that the minority of the Senate have decided, for satisfactory and I have no doubt entirely proper reasons, to resort to parliamentary tactics for the purpose of obstructing the consideration of this bill. I find no fault with this; it is a right which the minority, or any single member of the Senate, has; but I submit when the question has been once fairly presented to the Senate and a pronounced majority upon various motions that have been submitted has decided that this case is one that deserves and is entitled to consideration, whether it is not wise and manly and under all the circumstances fair and just that a claim which by common consent has some foundation in justice, which has long been before the body in various aspects for consideration, should now have a hearing. Where is the justice in attempting by motion after motion, against the sense of a majority of the body, to prevent the case from being heard? It is not a matter that involves any great principle. It is not a political matter. It is simply a matter between a citizen and the Government. The Senate has once by a decided vote agreed to allow a very considerable sum upon this claim; it has been considered by a committee of this body that has reported in favor of it, and the only thing now for the Senate to say in passing upon the testimony is whether a greater or less amount should be allowed. The facts are in the possession of the Senate; the documents are printed; the whole matter can be considered in an hour or two, and I appeal to the minority that they permit this case to be heard.

It is a delicate matter to touch upon, but I may say that to the claimant this is a matter of paramount and supreme importance. He is in circumstances that render action one way or the other upon this claim of the very highest moment to him, and inasmuch as it is a question to be determined upon evidence that has been taken by order of the Senate, I ask that these motions may now desist, and that we may have a hearing and a vote upon the claim.

Mr. BAYARD. I have not taken a great deal of interest in this matter, but I ask the Senator in the general drift of the business of the body is it just that a private claim like this should be taken up to the exclusion of the ordinary business of the morning hour? It is a very old claim; it has been discussed a great deal in the Senate; there is an opinion as to its merits, and I believe that the Senate have already passed one bill giving this claimant $100,000. His claim, I think, at one time amounted to a million and a half. It was cut down to $250,000. I think the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] reported a claim of some size. That bill was amended by the Senate after a very thorough debate, and I believe they passed it to give $100,000. Now where is that bill?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That bill went to the House, but was not acted on there.

Mr. BAYARD. May I now ask whether that was at the present Congress?

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir; it died with the last Congress.

Mr. BAYARD. It can hardly be said that there has been no day in court for the claimant. He has been heard in the Senate to my knowledge many times over for many years, and a bill has been passed in the way I have stated. I was not aware, for I have not got the run of the Calendar, whether the bill was passed at the present Congress or not.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It was in the last Congress.

Mr. BAYARD. If that bill was to be revived, I only say to Senators we are here in the morning hour, we are here near the close of the session. It is a question simply of economy of time. I think there are other measures more important to be considered.

Mr. BUTLER. Inasmuch as I have made one or two motions upon this subject, I desire simply to say in reply to the Senator from Kansas that I have not resorted to these motions simply for the purpose of filibustering.

Mr. INGALLS. I made no imputation of that kind on the Senator. I said the motions were proper and just, and the Senator had a right to make them. I conceded that fully; but I appeal to his reason and sense of justice whether or not we may not have a hearing of the claim.

Mr. BUTLER. Now I desire to appeal to the reason and sense of justice and fairness of those Senators who are pressing this claim with so much haste. It has been intimated again and again, clearly intimated, in fact it has been stated positively by Senators who have good grounds for opposing the bill, that they have not their papers in the Senate Chamber upon which to discuss it. Now, I appeal to the sense of fairness of the Senator from Kansas, to a very large minority of this body, if it is proper under these circumstances to insist upon the hearing of this case this morning? I have not the slightest objection to having it considered at the proper time. The Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL,] the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] and other Senators here desire to oppose it upon fair grounds, and still the Senator insists that we shall proceed with the case against this request of a very large minority of the Senate; and when it comes to a question of fairness I think we have just as much ground to stand upon as the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senate by a decided majority determined to take up the bill this morning.

Mr. BUTLER. That is true, but that decided majority would not insist upon it if the Senator from Wisconsin himself was not behind that proposition.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I am not pushing it forward; I have simply voted as one of the majority.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely.

Mr. MORRILL. Let me appeal to the Senator from Wisconsin, as the morning hour is so near the close that we manifestly cannot get through the bill this morning. I shall not perhaps want to occupy so much time as half an hour. I was perfectly willing to have the Senate vote on the bill after the motion was carried, made by the Senator from Wisconsin, to take it up this morning, but the time having been so far consumed, and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] having left his papers at home, and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] also having left his papers at home—I ask no favors on my own account—I suggest that this case go over until to-morrow morning, to be considered the first thing after the morning business to-morrow, in order that we may have full time to consider it. I think that will be fair to all sides.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If there can be unanimous consent that the bill shall be taken up to-morrow morning and considered at that time, I have no objection to allowing it to go over.

Mr. MORRILL. I will give my consent, though I am ready to go on and say what I have to say now.

Mr. INGALLS. To come up at the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow?

Mr. MORRILL. At the conclusion of the morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. BUTLER. I cannot give unanimous consent. There are so many other bills of so much more importance to the country than this that I cannot consent.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Very well, then, we will go on now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think, notwithstanding the dissent of the Senator from South Carolina, it is better not to waste another half hour, but the Senate to-morrow can, after the morning business, take up this bill and go on with it.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Vermont says he is ready to go on with the remarks he desires to make now.

Mr. MORRILL. But I do not think it quite right, because the Senate may not be called on to consider the subject as a whole now. I want to present what few remarks I have to make when the Senate is going to consider the subject.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand that the bill will be considered now if we go on with it.

Mr. MORRILL. I know, but we shall not get through by two o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina insist upon his objection?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to postpone the consideration of the bill until Tuesday.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I appeal to the Senate not to waste any more time about this matter, but to accept sub silentio the proposition that to-morrow a motion shall be made to take up this bill, and a majority can then act upon it.

Mr. MORRILL. It can be made anyhow.

Mr. SHERMAN. So far as I am concerned, I am following a committee of the Senate which I am told has unanimously or substantially unanimously reported this bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Unanimously.

Mr. SHERMAN. I never read the papers, but it seems to me under those circumstances, as it has been objected to in the course of the Calendar and now goes over and is taken up by a decided vote of the Senate, we ought to give this man a hearing. I am ready to sit as an impartial juror in the case.

Mr. BUTLER. I have not the slightest objection to his having a hearing, but there is only half an hour of the morning hour left.

Mr. SHERMAN. I say it ought not to be pressed now. Let it go over until to-morrow. The Senator from South Carolina ought to give way to-morrow and let it be heard.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senate will have a perfect right to consider the case to-morrow.

Mr. INGALLS. We have tried to consider it to-day, but the majority have been prevented from doing so by the motions that have been made under the rules of the Senate to postpone and otherwise procrastinate proceedings. Under the parliamentary methods they are correct and proper, and we have no assurance that the same proceedings will not be repeated to-morrow, and then we shall hear again at half past one that but half an hour of the morning hour remains, and that therefore we had better postpone to a more convenient season.

I see nothing to be gained by further procrastination, if we are to have exactly the same transactions repeated to-morrow morning, and of course the rights of the minority will be the same then as they are now. The Senator from South Carolina has said that he will not consent that the bill shall be taken up at the conclusion of routine business to-morrow morning; therefore how shall we proceed further with this business then than we can to-day?

Mr. BUTLER. I simply stated that I could not consent that unanimous consent should be given, and I shall commit myself no further than that. I have no desire whatever to prevent this case being considered if the Senator in charge of it will give those opposed to it a fair opportunity to discuss it, and we are not prepared to-day to discuss it. I think it is not asking too much of that very small majority to allow the bill to go over until to-morrow.

Mr. HOAR. I hope that will be acceded to, as a friend of the bill. What the Senator from South Carolina has now said will be to him a reason why he would not make filibustering motions, I am sure, to-morrow.

Mr. INGALLS. How does the Senator know that?

Mr. HOAR. Because I know enough of the honorable Senator from South Carolina to know that. I know perfectly well that if the honorable Senator from South Carolina asks the majority of the Senate to postpone this bill until to-morrow morning in order that gentlemen may get their papers, he is as absolutely incapable as any man I know of from then coming in with filibustering motions after the papers are obtained.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Massachusetts is perfectly safe in saying that I have no desire whatever to throw any unnecessary obstruction in the way of the consideration of this matter. All that I said was that I could not give unanimous consent, and I repeat that; but I have no desire whatever to throw any unnecessary obstruction in the way of the consideration of the measure if the friends of the measure will give the opponents of it a fair opportunity to discuss it, and that they have not done, in my judgment.

Mr. INGALLS. Then it is the understanding that to-morrow morning at the conclusion of the formal routine morning business this bill is to come up for consideration?

Mr. BUTLER. No, I give no unanimous consent.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Before the matter passes away I desire to say that I have voted for the motions to postpone not with any desire to prevent the Senate taking up any measure it wishes to take up, but on the statement made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] that he had not the papers here which he desired to have in order to discuss the question which we all know he made the most thorough examination of in opposition to the bill the last time it was before the Senate.

There is another reason why I think we ought not to take up this measure now. We are approaching the close of the session, and for one I am in favor of passing the necessary bills to maintain the Government, and then going home. We have been here long enough. This question ought to have been brought in at an earlier day, or it ought not to be brought in at this session, and it will provoke a debate that will keep us here perhaps two or three days longer than otherwise.

Mr. PLUMB. I will not give unanimous consent that this bill shall have the right of way to-morrow to the exclusion of everything else, because that is postponing the entire public business, the whole order of business of the Senate, and putting everybody on his honor that nothing else shall be done to-morrow. I said myself that I did not make my motion to postpone for a dilatory purpose, but simply that I might have an opportunity for preparation. It is true I did not appeal to that which is called courtesy of the Senate; but some gentlemen thought on the whole it was necessary to have protection for persons voting against the bill. I find that this committee had this bill from about the first day of the session to the 11th of April, a period of about four months. The dilatoriness was on the part of the committee, a committee that had examined this question before and had all the facts before them in regard to it. They waited from December to the 11th of April to know whether they should throw off a couple of hundred thousand dollars in this bill. I do not see anything else in the report that could occupy time.

I say that with reference to the complaint that enemies of the bill are pursuing it with dilatory tactics. The dilatory tactics practically have been on the part of the friends of the bill. I say simply that if it comes up to-morrow it will take its chances with me whether I shall object or not. I will make no pledges. I have never made agreements except in one or two cases. I think myself the Senators who have this bill in charge would have expedited it very much if they had consented that it might have gone over till Monday, so that there might be ample time to examine it. The river and harbor bill is to come up, and there are other things of importance demanding attention. I have not been able to be in attendance on the sessions of the Senate as I should like; but I know there are a great many other measures which I regard of more importance than this. Whatever I think my duty to the Senate requires me to vote to take up I shall vote for, not pledging myself as to any particular proposition.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is strange that this bill should be called up each session near the close of the session. I believe it has been uniformly so. During my early service in the Senate I was a member of the Committee on Claims, and among other claims that were referred to that committee and to myself as a sub-committee was this claim. I went through it as thoroughly as I knew how, gave considerable time to it, perhaps a week, in examining it. I reported it, and my recollection is now that that report was adverse. The committee and the Senate unanimously adopted the report. That is my recollection of it.

Then the claim was altogether different from what it is now. One examining the claim then and now would hardly know it was the same claim. New points have been presented. When one would go out, another would come in to supply the place, and so it has been running its course in the Senate for perhaps ten or twelve years. Sometimes a session or two has slipped by without any movement being made to take it up. It is a claim that many Senators believe has some merit. I thought at the time I examined it it had no merit and I think the Senate took that view of it. That is my recollection now.

I hardly think it ought to be pressed at the close of the session. I think it will take some time, and I agree with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB,] who just made reference to a bill that he had in charge. I believe it to be far more important to the country than the present bill. The Senator from Kansas has given notice that he will ask for the taking up soon of what is known as the agricultural bill. That bill passed the other branch of Congress almost unanimously. It has received the unanimous report of our Committee on Agriculture. It is one that more than half the people of this country are interested in, and one that ought to have its day. This bill has had a great many days. I hope the Senator from Kansas will press that bill. I think it ought to be taken up; the Senate ought to act on it. The large interest that that bill represents should be taken care of in preference to any private bill, no matter what it may be.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Mr. President, this bill was reported from the Committee on Claims on the 11th day of April last. It is No. 539 on the Calendar. When it was reached in its regular order its consideration was temporarily objected to by, I think, the Senator from Kansas who sits in my rear, [Mr. PLUMB.] I gave notice then that I would move to take it up at an early day. I have endeavored two or three times to get it up since then, but it has been crowded out by other measures pending before the Senate. I think this is just as good a time to consider it as will occur during this session or any other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Tuesday next.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I will consent that the bill go over. I am afraid that no general consent can be obtained to consider it to-morrow, but I give notice now that immediately after the routine business of the morning hour has been gone through with to-morrow I will then move to take up the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over.

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT.

Mr. PLUMB. I now want to give notice that immediately after the conclusion of the morning hour to-morrow I shall move to take up the bill (H. R. No. 4429) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 3d instant, approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 1020) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River at the town of Van Buren, Crawford County, Arkansas; and

An act (S. No. 1810) to authorize the Rock Island and Southwestern Railway Company to construct a bridge over the Mississippi River at New Boston, State of Illinois.

W. S. KIMBALL AND OTHERS.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I ask the Senate before proceeding with the Calendar to take up and consider the bill (S. No. 1377) for the relief of W. S. Kimball and others.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. JOHNSTON. This bill will only take a minute.

Mr. COCKRELL. We shall reach it on the Calendar.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the bill?

Mr. JOHNSTON. It is a bill reported by the Finance Committee.

Mr. COCKRELL and others. Regular order!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is called for.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Virginia has a right to make his motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator wish the sense of the Senate tested?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia moves to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1377.

Mr. INGALLS. Will not the Senator from Virginia state what is the purpose and object and scope of the bill, in general terms?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is dividing.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear the subject of the bill stated. I should like to vote intelligently.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The purpose of the bill is to refund certain taxes on tobacco. The law imposed a tax of twenty cents on tobacco, and on the 3d of March, 1875, the tax was raised to twenty-four cents. That law, however, did not take effect until the President signed it on the evening of the 3d of March. On the day of the 3d of March, before the President signed the bill, parties paid the tax at twenty cents, and the Department afterward required them to pay the twenty-four cents, making a difference of four cents a pound, the tax having been paid before the bill was actually signed by the President.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the aggregate amount to be refunded?

Mr. JOHNSTON. From ten to fifteen thousand dollars; I do not know exactly. The bill leaves it to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury after proof of the fact that the tax was actually paid before the signing of the act.

Mr. INGALLS. Has that bill been reported by the Finance Committee?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Reported unanimously by the Finance Committee.

Mr. BECK. The bill is a perfectly good one, in my opinion, and has been reported unanimously by the Finance Committee. The only trouble is that there are a dozen or two just as good cases ahead of it. Let it come up in its order. If we displace the Calendar once we shall displace it all the time.

Mr. COCKRELL. This is order of business No. 703 on the Calendar. We are now on the regular call of the Calendar at No. 577. There are a number of bills of precisely the same character reported before this from the Finance Committee, one particularly nearly fifty numbers ahead of this reported from the same committee and of the same character. It is a great injustice to these other cases that we should consume the entire time of the Senate in taking this up and considering it instead of running through the Calendar and considering them all in order.

Mr. JOHNSTON. We could have passed the bill by this time.

Mr. COCKRELL. You will not get it passed this morning.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I ask for a vote on my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia to take up for consideration the bill named by him.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 18, noes 12; no quorum voting.

Mr. COCKRELL and Mr. INGALLS. Call the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senator from Virginia does not care to break us up. This bill undoubtedly will be passed before the close of the session. I am in favor of the bill. There are several tobacco bills.

Mr. COCKRELL. We can reach it if we stick to the Calendar.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I do not want to consume the time of the Senate. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first case on the Calendar will be called.

Mr. INGALLS. Has not the want of a quorum been disclosed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Chair can ascertain if a quorum is present by counting the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair by count finds that there is a quorum. Forty-five members are present. The Senate will proceed to the consideration of cases on the Calendar under the Anthony rule.

ELIZA E. HEBERT.

The bill (S. No. 386) for the relief of Mrs. Eliza E. Hebert was announced as first in order on the Calendar.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That bill was not reported unanimously from the Committee on Claims. There was a minority disagreeing to it, though no minority report was filed. I think it had better go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is objected to.

PROPERTY OF LITTLE SISTERS OF THE POOR.

The bill (S. No. 1612) to provide for the closing of an alley in square 751, in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and for the relief of the Little Sisters of the Poor, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. INGALLS. That stands on a motion to reconsider, having once been passed by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ALDRICH,] who made the motion to reconsider, is not in his seat.

Mr. HOAR. That does not belong on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion to reconsider a bill which has passed is always entered on the Calendar. It can be called up hereafter.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to have that bill remain in its place on the Calendar because it ought to be disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over without prejudice.

PUNISHMENT OF HOUSE-BREAKING.

The bill (S. No. 1754) to punish breaking and entering banks, shops, stores, and other buildings in the District of Columbia, with intent to commit larceny or any felony therein, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HARRIS. There is a House bill on the same subject that is substantially the same, that was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and I was instructed to report it back. I ask that the House bill be considered instead of this Senate bill on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered if there be no objection. Where is the House bill?

Mr. HARRIS. It has not been reported formally.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire, while the Senator is looking for his bill, whether this is not an offense now?
